Canada urges end of UN monitoring of Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada has joined other countries in calling for an end to the mandate of the United Nations' special investigator for human rights abuses in Israel's occupied territories.

Canada says that from now on, one possibility is to treat Israel like any other country and let it fall under normal UN reviews of human rights violations.

But at the same time, Ottawa has strongly condemned alleged human rights abuses by Israeli security forces against Palestinians.

The remarks came last week in Geneva, where the president of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations Human Rights Commission (UNHCR), Leonard Legault, slammed alleged human rights violations by both Israel and the new Palestinian Authority in the autonomous Gaza Strip and Jericho.

Legault said the UNHCR should "terminate" the mandate of its special rapporteur (monitor) on human rights in the territories.

In fact, Legault pointed out, Canada opposed the establishment of the special investigator in 1993 "because we did not regard this particular situation [in the territories] as one that warranted such a measure.

"This remains Canada's view ... Another approach might be to place this mandate on the same footing as that of other country rapporteurs, to be reviewed on a yearly basis in light of developments," Legault told the commission.

Legault's remarks came on the same day that the UN's special monitor on human rights in the territories, Rene Felber, quit his post, saying it was more important to back the peace process than denounce abuses.

In fact, Felber himself recommended that his job be eliminated because it was "useless" to issue reports that Israel did not act upon.

Sounding pessimistic, Felber told the 53-nation body that he's afraid the peace process "is crumbling and that the Israeli government will fall. The only solution to me is to choose a political alternative and to renounce my mandate."

It was not clear whether Felber would be replaced.

Canada's view was endorsed by the United States.

Paul Marcus, director of B'nai Brith Canada's institute for international affairs, told The CJN that Legault's comments closely reflect the views of BBC, which recently called on Ottawa to take action in treating Israel more equitably on the human rights front.

In a statement last week, BBC said it welcomed Legault's comments but added it remains concerned over allegations of human rights violations by Israel.

Legault stressed that despite the possible absence of a monitor, Israel won't be let off the hook. "The commission must maintain its scrutiny of human rights problems in the occupied territories."

Although Canada is "all too painfully aware of the new wave of anti-Israel violence," it is concerned about reported use of force by Israeli security forces during interrogation of Palestinians; persons held without charge; refusal by Israel to grant work or exit permits, and other alleged abuses.

At the same time, Legault seemed to soft-pedal reported human rights violations by Palestinian forces.

He said Canada "is keeping close track of the treatment of human rights by the Palestinian National Authority. To go from being a movement to being a government is not an easy transition. Our Palestinian partners have given us real cause for hope that their society will be.

"We realize that this is a transitional period, that the Palestinian Authority has only recently taken control and that the police forces are inexperienced."

But he said attacks against Israel have been committed by "criminals and fanatics."

Legault said more construction of Jewish settlements beyond the Green Line "is contrary to international humanitarian law" and "greatly hinders the possibility of a negotiated solution."

Michel de Salaberry, director of the Middle East Relations division at the ministry of foreign affairs, told The CJN that Legault's statement "speaks for itself."

Canada joins other countries in pledging aid to Palestinians

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Representatives from Canada and more than 30 countries who have pledged funds toward the improvement of Palestinians' quality of life met last week in Gaza City for the first time since the Palestinian Authority (PA) took charge.

The two-day conference of the Local Aid Coordination Committee (LACC) reviewed ongoing problems with the international aid effort, valued at some $2 billion (US), and discussed how to improve it this year, an aide to Terje Larsen, the United Nations' special coordinator, said.

Canada has pledged $55 million over five years toward several projects in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The decision to hold the conference in Gaza was taken at the Brussels meeting of donor states in November, when the LACC was established.

PLO leader Yasser Arafat briefly attended the meeting, and called on donors to accelerate aid because of Israel's sealing of the Gaza Strip. A month ago, Arafat claimed that less than 10 per cent of the promised funds had arrived.

But by the meeting's end, representatives of the donor countries said they would get more involved in projects with Palestinians.

Palestinians asked donors to simplify procedures for approving projects, increase their presence in local offices, and import more Palestinian goods. Israel was asked to facilitate the flow of necessary capital goods and to support economic growth.

Donor nations said they were worried that the PA is not going to achieve its tax collection targets, as the economy of Gaza continues to deteriorate due to the closure and the bombing attacks which prompted it.

The Week in Israel

Jan. 30:

• A military tribunal ordered a Palestinian man to serve nine life sentences for being an accomplice to the suicide bomber who carried out the April attack in Afula, in which nine people were killed and more than 50 wounded.

• The Palestinian Authority said it expects to begin distributing passports to Gaza and Jericho residents by mid-February. The passports are expected to be accepted as a legal document by most foreign states.

• An estimated 3,000 people gathered at the Western Wall to pray for help in light of the current security situation. The special prayers were called for by Israel's Chief Rabbis.

Jan. 31:

• Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said he prefers importing foreign workers to employing Arabs from the territories. "I prefer to have workers from Thailand here instead of Arab knifers stabbing innocent passersby in sovereign Israel," Rabin said.

• The Knesset defeated a Likud-sponsored bill to immediately deport the families of suicide terrorists by a vote of 48 to 32. Justice Minister David Liba'i noted that several opposition MKs were "noticeably absent" for the vote.

• The Knesset passed the bill implementing the peace treaty with Jordan, by 52 votes to two. Two MKs from the right-wing Moledet party were the only no votes.

Feb. 1:

• Sixty per cent of Palestinians in the West Bank approve of terror attacks against Israelis, according to a poll carried out by a Palestinian research institute.

Feb. 2:

• Israel welcomed 4,315 new immigrants in January, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel. The number of olim since December, 1989, when the first wave of immigrants began, stands at 611,458, with 89 per cent having come from the former Soviet Union.

Feb. 3:

• Two Eilat residents were killed when they drove their jeep over an anti-tank mine in the southern Negev.

Feb. 5:

• Israel and Oman postponed a decision on when to establish low-level diplomatic ties.

Permanent closure studied for territories

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel should consider giving substantial aid to the Palestinian Authority (PA), in order to maintain a permanent closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Environment Minister Yossi Sarid and Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein reportedly proposed at Sunday's cabinet meeting.

The government decided not to ease the closure of the territories imposed after the Jan. 22 Beit Lid bombing.

Sarid said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin would discuss lifting the closure of the territories in his meeting this week with PLO chairman Yasser Arafat.

Officials in the Prime Minister's Office said humanitarian exceptions — medical aid, for example — are being made to the closure.

Palestinian produce and other goods can also enter Israel, officials said.

Sarid and Rubinstein reportedly said an Israeli aid plan could work as "a substitute" for the roughly 50,000 Palestinians who normally work in the Jewish state, and would also make Israel more secure.

"I propose paying the Palestinian Authority a billion shekels a year to maintain a permanent closure, while not creating insufferable human and economic misery," Sarid said after the cabinet meeting. "If it is possible to buy better security for a billion shekels and accelerate the peace process, there is no better and justified deal."

Sarid and Rubinstein said a "zipper policy" of closing, then reopening the territories, is futile.

Rabin "is not exactly enthusiastic about the idea," an aide said.

Israel's Health Minister Ephraim Sneh reportedly reminded fellow ministers that 40 per cent of all employed Gazans worked in Israel, as did 30 per cent of all employed Palestinians from the West Bank.

Terrorists ambush Israelis

Isranet News Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian terrorists opened fire on a passing car early Monday morning, killing one Israeli man and seriously wounding another.

The attack occurred at the Nahal Oz junction inside the Gaza Strip. The Israeli vehicle held civilian security guards and was traveling with a Palestinian police escort.

The police returned fire but the attackers escaped.

The attack prompted the Israeli government to re-impose the closure of the Gaza Strip for at least another two weeks.

PLO chairman Yasser Arafat denounced the incident and described the attackers as "enemies of peace."

Deputy Defense Minister Mordechai Gur said the Palestinian Authority is responsible for bringing the killers to justice.

Harris said the comments about a shortage of resources points to a lack of political will to pursue the issue among some government ministers.

He said Congress favors criminal prosecution of war crimes suspects, despite arguments from Justice that the Supreme Court decision in the Imre Finta case made successful prosecutions virtually unattainable.

A Canadian jury faced with an egregious crime like that of Helmut Rauca, who was extradited im 1982 to West Germany for the murder of more than 10,000 Jews, would no doubt convict, he said.

"We were given solid assurances by Mr. Eggleton that he would do everything in his power to ensure that proper funding was available to deal with alleged Nazi war criminals," said Congress president Irving Abella.

Abella said Congress is disappointed that only four cases will be commenced this year. "If you had eight or nine cases of drug dealers, they'd look at all eight," he said.

Sabina Citron, vice-chair of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, said deportation was not an adequate remedy. She called for extradition of suspects to countries where they could face justice.

David Matas, chair of B'nai Brith's war crimes committee, said he was "unhappy that Immigration is staggering the cases. They're giving phony reasons for delay."

Proceedings should be launched against all war crimes suspects, he said, adding that the government would never stagger the cases if they involved a dozen Canadian mass murderers.

The tack adopted by the government shows that "if the crime is not committed against Canadians, it doesn't matter as much."

That is reflected in government inaction against other alleged war criminals, he said. Matas, who is also president of the Canadian Council for Refugees, said "One community after another says, 'Our murderers are among us.'"

Matas suggested that international criminal fugitives from countries like Rwanda, Bosnia and Somalia see Canada as a place of refuge. "I think we're suffering the consequences of failing to do anything about Nazi war criminals," he added.

Sergio Marchi

Sol Littman, Canadian director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, called the recent government announcement "the same sorry record of faint-hearted, half-measures that has typified all Canadian governments since the end of World War II. It is absolutely insulting for the government to hide behind the lack of resources in this matter given the large staff and enormous budgets enjoyed by both Justice and Immigration departments."

Citizenship and Immigration spokesman Roger White said "we are proceeding with the first four because they represent the strongest cases." The ministry will proceed with the next cases "after monitoring the proceedings on the first four. We're looking for preliminary judicial direction (precedents)."

White pointed out that Citizenship and Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi has said that "cost is a factor. Anything the government does at taxpayers' expense is a factor. However the overriding factor is our legal and moral responsibility."

Ministry spokesperson Pam Cullum said the identities of the four suspects are not being released because of "privacy considerations." Should the names be released before the cases reach court, other elderly people with similar names could be called by the media and upset, she said.

Milton Harris

Cullum said that since 1990 the Immigration Department has intervened in about 80 cases to oppose refugee claims by those the department suspects were involved in war crimes. She said the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) has rejected about 60 of the claims but she acknowledged the Immigration Department was unsure as to the claimants' subsequent status and was trying to track them. Some may have asked for judicial review of the IRB decision, she said.

Peter Kremer, head of Justice's war crimes unit, said the unit had been cut back in size to 24 staff members from its peak of 37. That number will be further reduced on March 31 to only 11 — four lawyers, two historians, one historical support person, two paralegals and two secretaries.

Other Justice Department lawyers will be assigned the denaturalization cases as lead counsel and lawyers from the war crimes unit will serve as support counsel, he said. Kremer said he "can't answer" whether he'd be more comfortable with the unit's lawyers serving as lead counsel.

He also declined to comment whether he was happy with the reduction in staff. As to the unit's morale in the wake of the cutbacks, Kremer said "it's as positive as can be under the circumstances."

Unilateral settlement with Palestinians seen possible

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — If Israel cannot reach an agreement with the Palestinians soon, it may impose a settlement unilaterally, according to several Israeli analysts.

"With every terrorist bombing, Israel moves away from a negotiated settlement, and closer to unilateral decision-making," said Dr. Gerald Steinberg of Bar Ilan University's Besa Centre for Strategic Studies.

This week may mark a step in that direction as a government committee, headed by Police Minister Moshe Shahal, begins looking at practical ways to bring about a complete separation between Israelis and Palestinians. One measure to be discussed is the construction of a security fence.

"Erecting a physical barrier between Palestinians and Israelis is a way of establishing facts. It is setting up the parameters for a permament settlement — whether the Palestinians agree to them or not," Steinberg said.

"It is a warning to the Palestinians that unless they take a firmer stand on terrorism, Israel will act unilaterally," said Prof. Stuart Cohen, also of the Besa Centre.

The pressure for Israel to act on its own comes in the wake of increasing frustration with the stalled peace process. Israelis, fed up with the deteriorating security situation, want to keep Palestinians out of their cities.

"For many years we had a naive view that we could live and work together," Steinberg said. "But that concept of integration is being replaced by one of separation."

"The explosion outside Dizengoff Centre marked a turning point in the public attitude towards the peace process," said Joseph Alpher, director of the Israel-Middle East office of the American Jewish Committee. "The attack at Beit Lid reinforced the public sense that if peace is not accompanied by separation it is not a peace worth having."

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin spoke of separation in the aftermath of the Dizengoff attack. In his state of the nation address after the Beit Lid attack, he reiterated the need for separation and appointed a committee to look into the matter.

But real separation means more than erecting fences. It means delineating boundaries, uprooting some Jewish settlements and imposing a permanent closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Is the government ready to do that?

Most analysts are skeptical. "This government is not willing to dismantle any Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip," said Cohen. "And without doing that there can be no real separation because the populations are so intermingled."

"The Palestinians will reject an imposed settlement because whatever part of the West Bank we give them will not be enough. They want it all," said Steinberg. "I don't think the government will be able to withstand the protests from the Palestinians and the rest of the Arab world."

"It's a long way from rhetoric to action when it comes to separation," Alpher said. But he believes Israel is moving in that direction. "There is a struggle between different forces. As long as the Palestinians are economically dependent on Israel, and as long as there are Jewish settlements in the heart of the West Bank, the difficulties of separation are awesome. On the other hand, the security services favor separation. Every time there is a terrorist attack, the security argument is paramount for a week. But as time goes by the other pressures become stronger. Ultimately, the security concern will become so strong that it will permanently over-ride the other concerns."

In Alpher's view, every atrocity will tip the balance, until separation — even a unilaterally imposed one — becomes inevitable.

Ties with Egypt deteriorate

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Only three months ago, Israeli diplomats were hailing a new, warmer era in Israel's bilateral relations with Egypt.

Today, they are scrambling to halt what seems like a sudden deterioration in these ties.

ANALYSIS

Israel has good reason to be concerned. Egypt — the first Arab land to sign a peace treaty with Israel — is the most influential nation in the Arab world. Cairo is also a valued intermediary between Israel and those of its Arab adversaries, such as Syria, still in a technical state of war with Israel. Therefore, Egypt is of prime importance to Israel.

Nevertheless, Israel's pivotal relationship with Egypt has been rocked by a series of crises since 1979, the year Anwar Sadat and Menachem Begin signed the historic peace.

Events in the 1980s, such as Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights, its bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor, its invasion of Lebanon and its armed response to the intifadah, did not sit well with the Egyptian regime, and deepened what came to be known as Israel's "cold peace" with Egypt.

But Israel expected a considerable improvement in relations with Egypt after its rapprochement with the PLO in 1993.

In fact, much to Israel's delight, Egypt took practical steps at normalizing relations in such key areas as trade, tourism and culture.

Yet as these developments gradually unfolded in the past year, ominous signs appeared, suggesting that Egypt was pursuing a double-edged policy which Israel regarded as hostile.

Egypt has launched an international campaign to force Israel to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which comes up for renewal in April. At the very least, Egypt reportedly expects Israel to impose a freeze on the production and acquisition of weapons-grade nuclear materials.

Israel denies it possesses a nuclear arsenal. Yet Israel has expressed a willingness to sign the treaty within the context of a comprehensive Middle East peace settlement. These disputes were not solved at last week's regional summit in Cairo.

Another complaint heard in Jerusalem is that Egypt has used its clout to thwart Israel's diplomatic drive to establish open and official links with Arab League nations like the Comoros Islands, Oman and Qatar.

President Hafez al-Assad of Syria has apparently convinced President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt that Israel should not reap any further tangible political benefits from the current peace process until Israel signs an agreement to withdraw from the Golan Heights.

In any event, Egypt believes that Israeli settlements have caused a breakdown in the peace process.

As a result of these factors, Mubarak has broken his longstanding pledge to visit Israel. Last December, Israeli President Chaim Weizman threatened to call off his trip to Egypt unless Mubarak delivered on his promise. But in the end, Weizman went to Cairo without a reciprocal gesture from Mubarak.

The tension has also prompted an exchange of verbal unpleasantries.

Last month, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin warned that Israel must prepare for war over the middle or long term, given the uncertainties in the region. Mubarak reacted angrily, and his chief aide, Osama al-Baz, countered by saying that Egypt did not rule out another Arab-Israeli armed conflict.

In a bid to mollify Mubarak, Rabin wrote a letter explaining he did not mean to threaten war.

Be that as it may, Israel's ties with Egypt remain frayed.

Jewish leader kidnapped in San Salvador

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SAN SALVADOR — The leader of El Salvador's Jewish community was kidnapped last week in this capital city, police officials said.

Jean-Claude Kahn, 51, a businessman of French descent, was abducted Tuesday from his Mercedes-Benz by six armed men near a private university in downtown San Salvador, police said.

It remains unclear whether the kidnapping was financially motivated or occurred because Kahn is prominent in the Jewish community.

A Lebanese community exists in San Salvador, raising speculation that the kidnapping was directed against the Jewish community there, said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the New York-based World Jewish Congress.

Toronto firm reaches for the stars

By PAUL LUNGEN

TORONTO — Uriel Domb doesn't like to say "I told you so," but he was quite satisfied when Israel finally took his advice and entered the space age.

About 20 years ago, Domb, at the time an administrator with Telesat Canada, wrote to Israeli government officials and explained to them the advantage of having their own eye in the sky military satellite. Such a piece of hardware, he indicated, would give Israel advanced notice of missile attacks from its Arab foes.

During the 1991 Gulf War when Iraqi Scuds rained down on the Jewish state, Israel had to rely on the United States for early warning of the attacks. Since then, Israel has launched two of its own military satellites called Ofeq (Horizon) that provide state-of-the-art reconnaissance.

As president and owner of Telespace Ltd., a satellite consulting company, Domb was involved in developing some of the software for the Ofeq project.

And the company's links to Israel's high frontier are continuing as the Toronto-based company provides consulting services for Amos, Israel's civilian communications satellite that is scheduled for launch later this year.

Unlike Ofeq, which was placed in low earth orbit by an Israeli-designed and built launcher, Amos will ride into space on board Ariane, the French-made rocket. Amos will provide Israeli consumers with high quality television reception, business data and telephone services. Its reach is so broad that it could serve most of the Middle East and even parts of Eastern Europe one day, Domb said.

Telespace's expertise will be used for the highly technical but crucial aspects of satellite technology such as ground control, station-keeping (maintaining the satellite in an orbit over a specific geographic point), attitude control, propulsion, thermal design, antenna structure and command frequency coordination (making sure the satellite's radio frequency does not interfere with other satellites).

Operating out of his Toronto home, Domb relies on the skills of experts under contract to Telespace to provide all these services. Telespace employs up to 25 people on any particular project, Domb said, making it the smallest of only a handful of companies worldwide that offer consulting services on satellite technology.

"This is a very specialized field," Domb said. "I have some of the best experts in the world involved in satellite technology. Through projects in the past and by word of mouth, we get invited to bid on international projects."

The projects come up on an occasional basis, as various countries decide to place satellites in orbit to enhance their cross-country communications. Telespace played a key role in Eutelsat, the Paris-based communications satellite that is used primarily to broadcast television signals across Europe, North Africa and the Middle East.

"Our role was to advise the organization how to set up the entire ground control for the satellite system and also help them in the launch ... We developed a strategy for station-keeping," he said.

Another major project for the company was Inmarsat, a satellite that services merchant marines and passenger liners with ship to shore communications.

Telespace has also worked as a consultant on Brazilian communications satellites and helped train future personnel to operate the hi-tech devices.

A native of Israel, Domb said his interest in the high frontier can be traced back to his youth in the mid to late '50s. At the time, Israelis were very interested in aviation and many young people could identify air force planes by sight.

Leaving Israel to pursue his studies in the United States, Domb was caught up in the frantic U.S. effort to catch up with the Russians after Sputnik. He studied astronautics (the science of flying objects in space) at the Polytchnical Institute of New York and later aerospace engineering at Cornell. His first job was at the Goddard Space Flight Centre in Washington.

Cacta-Prost supplement treats prostate discomforts

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

LONDON, Ont. — A local man once skeptical about the benefits of health food and herbal medicine has acquired the exclusive Canadian rights to a herbal supplement taken by men in Israel, Spain and the Netherlands to ease the discomfort of benign prostate enlargement.

Sam Sussman, the director of the social services department at the London Psychiatric Hospital and a PhD in social sciences, said he first heard of the supplement in The Canadian Jewish News 2½ years ago.

The supplement, made from pulverized flowers of the Indian-fig prickly pear cactus, was clinically tested in 1992 at the Soroka Medical Centre at Ben-Gurion University in the Negev.

After taking the supplement daily for two to eight months, 50 per cent of the patients reported a decreased urgency to urinate, 62 per cent reported fewer daily and nightly urinations, and 14 per cent, who were candidates for surgery while starting treatment, cancelled the surgery due to shrinking of the prostate gland.

Made up of 58 and 30 patients each, the clinical trials were supervised by urologist Dr. Israel Levin and herbalist Gideon Earon.

In the September 1994 issue of the International Journal of Alternative and Complementary Medicine, Levin, Earon and Dan Palevitch, affiliated with the Israeli agricultural research organization Bet Dagan, said "the results are encouraging and suggest that the [Indian-fig prickly pear] cactus may have clinical application in treatment of enlarged prostate glands."

Benign prostate hypertrophy is common in men over 50. Conventional treatment involves surgery. The prescription drug phinesteride is the newest treatment method.

He wanted the rights to the supplement, known as Cacta-Prost in Canada, because there was nothing like it available here. "I thought the product was good and I thought it would be profitable in Canada," he said.

Sussman expects his high start-up costs, including incorporation fees and business and legal advice, to affect profitability at first. "Even if it's successful, which I expect it will be, I'll make absolutely nothing for two years."

Pure Source Inc., a distributor of natural supplements, will soon be offering Cacta-Prost to 1,700 health food stores across Canada.

Israeli tax to be repealed

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM—Capitulating to widespread pressure, the Israeli government announced last week it is planning to cancel a controversial capital gains tax.

Finance Minister Avraham Shohat said he would recommend repealing the controversial tax, which was passed late last year and took effect on Jan. 1.

If the cabinet approves Shohat's recommendation, as, at press time, it was expected to do, legislation will then be prepared to repeal the tax. Shohat said his decision came in the wake of "political and public pressure" to cancel the tax and did not reflect a change in his own thinking. "I still believe a tax on stock profits is the right and just thing," he said.

Shohat had waged a personal political battle for passage of the tax, but he said he had no plans to resign in the wake of the controversy. As for the projected $167 million in state revenue the tax had been expected to generate, Shohat said the gap would have to be made up in some other way.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who had waffled on the tax before its passage, said he accepted Shohat's decision to repeal the tax altogether. He added that his faith in the finance minister had not wavered.

The tax had been a source of controversy within the Labor Party prior to its implementation, with some government ministers and Knesset members fearing it would erode already waning support for the party.

Trade Minister Michael Harish called for a coordinated effort of ministries to ensure continued growth of the economy. Meanwhile, opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu of Likud said the government should never have passed such a tax. The latest events only highlight that the "government is confused and can't make policy decisions," Netanyahu said, adding that the best thing for the Rabin government to do at this point is to step down. In New York, share prices of Israeli companies surged following the news.

BUSINESS BRIEFS

Dynacare to sell operation

TORONTO — Dynacare Inc., a leader in diagonistic laboratory services, has agreed to sell its lifestyle retirement communities operation for $115 million to International Care Corporation, a wholly-owned subsidiary of London Life Insurance Company. Closing is scheduled for Feb. 28.

The sale will enable Dynacare to concentrate on providing laboratory services to physicians, hospitals and clinics in North America.

Dynacare president Harvey Shapiro said the sale "a positive step" for the company and its shareholders. Dynacare expects the sale will reduce its long-term debt by approximately $118 million.

Oil struck near Dead Sea

JERUSALEM— Israel's National Oil Company announced that it struck oil at a drilling site near the Dead Sea.

The company said the field could possibly produce about 80 barrels of high quality oil a day. Tests are being carried out to see whether the oil is available in commercial quantities.

Previous exploratory drilling in the Dead Sea area and off the coast of Haifa have resulted in the finding of oil traces, but none revealed commercial quantities. With the announcement of the oil find, share prices of the National Oil Company jumped 10 per cent on the Tel Aviv stock exchange — the maximum fluctuation allowed — before trading was halted.

PKNS: Partners in your Financial Future

With the Canadian dollar heading towards an all time low, record government deficits, political turmoil and an uncertain financial future, where does one turn, to achieve STRONG, STEADY AND CERTAIN GROWTH for their hard-earned RRSP and investment dollars?

How does one set a plan for financial security today and into the future?

And who can guide you through the confusing maze of options, jargon and advertising?

One firm, which specializes in servicing the needs of Toronto's Jewish community has set a new standard for personal service, professional financial advice and creative tax reduction strategies for their clients.

Nathan Disenhouse, Zale Newman and Ken Stern are the senior partners of PKNS Insurance and Financial Services, one of Toronto's fastest growing personal financial services firms.

Servicing the needs of Toronto's Jewish Community

Their conservative investment strategies, personalized approach and scientific assessment of the financial opportunities available provide a sense of comfort that your RRSP funds and investments are under sound, safe, conservative management.

With over 1000 Mutual Funds available in Canada today and huge opportunities for tax reduction and global investments, the partners in PKNS pride themselves in WORKING FOR YOU, NOT FOR A PARTICULAR FINANCIAL COMPANY.

PKNS represents virtually EVERY MAJOR FINANCIAL AND INSURANCE COMPANY in Canada. Using state-of-the-art computer technology they measure the performance of every fund over the short term and the long term to provide you with the most consistent performers in each category.

Current peak performers include funds from Fidelity Investments, North America's most popular and successful family funds, as well as Dynamic, Global Strategy, C.I., Templeton, Trimark, Mackenzie and Elliott & Page.

As one example, PKNS recommends FIDELITY RSP GLOBAL BOND FUND, which invests in foreign currency bonds of various Canadian governments and corporations. With the falling Canadian dollar and interest rate fluctuations there is great potential for capital appreciation by taking advantage of the foreign currency values in these bonds.

Other funds provide a way to put more than the basic 20% of your RRSP into foreign investments to take advantage of booming economics in the US, Europe and elsewhere in the world.

Still other funds provide you with high returns for your non-RRSP investments at VERY LOW TAX rates by focusing on specific tax-advantaged investments.

There is an additional opportunity to invest an additional $8000 in your RRSP this year, if you have not made your once-in-a-lifetime over contribution. This opportunity will likely disappear in the near future.

As well there is an opportunity for business owners to increase their RRSP and their spouse's RRSP maximum contribution to $19,500 by use of a creative pension approach.

The key is to have a team of personal financial managers who can assess the opportunities, and design a personal strategy JUST FOR YOU. This includes diversifying your RRSP's and investments to take advantage of global opportunities and tax reduction strategies.

The partners of PKNS provide ongoing review and assessments of your investments and RRSP's and meet with their clients on a regular basis to review opportunities and suggest changes and improvements.

As part of a total personalized approach, PKNS provides more than 50 years of experience in personalized Estate planning, Life and Disability insurance, and Tax reduction strategies.

Here too, the partners of PKNS and their associated company Panfinancial WORK FOR YOU, NOT A PARTICULAR INSURANCE COMPANY. They provide life insurance planning in U.S. or Canadian dollars, insurance payable in PRE-TAX dollars and their unique "unlimited RRSP" amongst their may innovative, creative planning approaches.

Zale Newman, Nathan Disenhouse, Ken Stern

Many innovative, creative planning approaches

Combined with their standing-room only financial and tax reduction seminars, which this fall featured financial advisor, Dr. Jerry White, the tax accounting firm of Ernst and Young and Gord Berger, the legendary "guru" of insurance and tax planning, it is no wonder that the partners of PKNS are known as the "Leading Edge" personal financial advisors.

As Canadians shudder from the financial earthquake that has struck Canada, caused by huge government deficits, rising interest rates and a falling dollar, your SAFEST FINANCIAL STRATEGY is to have the partners of PKNS become PARTNERS IN YOUR FINANCIAL FUTURE.

If you have a minimum of $50,000 in your RRSP or in your investment fund call:

Woburn Securities

Do you need to buy U.S. dollars? For the last 15 years, Woburn Securities has specialized in one service: cashing Israel Bonds before they mature. Thus, you can tap into U.S. cash at record high exchange rates. At the rate you currently pay the bank, you'll be happy to know that you have U.S. dollars in your safety deposit box right now! Woburn's fee is surprisingly low, and the service is friendly and convenient.

Woburn offers you other related services. If you need to buy a large quantity of U.S. dollars, Woburn will give you a better rate than the bank. If you need to transfer funds between Israel and Canada — for example, if you sell a house in Tel Aviv and need to repatriate funds to Canada — Woburn handles the conversion from shekels, and will pay you in either Canadian or U.S. dollars.

The volume of trade and business between Canada and Israel is increasing. With a Canada-Israel free trade agreement in the offing, trade will almost certainly grow. This, in turn, means a greater need to convert shekels to dollars, U.S. or Canadian, and vice versa. And this is where Woburn Securities can assist you.

The Hour Office has introduced a new concept to Toronto: office space available by the hour. The new facility opened on December 1, in the heart of Toronto's business, financial and hotel district. There is a large market for this service among home entrepreneurs who need extra office space or facilities, and executives from out of town who need to work in a professional setting.

General Manager Carolyn Young says that the Hour Office idea is "vastly superior" to the office-in-a-room scheme promoted by some hotel chains. While the concept appeals to all business people, says Young, "women travelling on business have voiced particularly strong support. For them, the Hour Office is a businesslike alternative to conducting one-on-one meetings in a hotel room or a public place."

The Hour Office meets many business needs:

- extra space for meetings, interviews or receptions;
- location and services close to the city centre;
- first class professional office setting;
- a "home-turf" advantage in dealing with people from out of town;
- a totally private setting, with no risk of interruption.

The Hour Office is ideal for people doing business downtown, with no time to return to their office or home in outlying areas, who need privacy to make phone calls or use office equipment. For executives who need to meet managers from across the country, the Hour Office provides a central meeting place where lunch can be brought in. The Hour Office can also meet the needs of companies doing business in two cities, for example Montreal and Toronto, with a head office in Montreal and a sales force here.

The Hour Office provides 21 mahogany-furnished private offices with windows, as well as three boardrooms and a meeting room which holds up to 60 people; there is also a showroom. For a more relaxed atmosphere, there is even a living room suite.

Every office has a computer hook-up, and Compaq or Macintosh computers may be rented. Boardrooms and showroom are equipped for audio-visual presentations. Local calls are free, with the message centre fully operational during business hours. Word processing, faxing, photocopying, dictating, printing, translation and audio-visual services are available, as are satellite conference and teleconference capabilities.

Individualized reception is provided. There are warm-up kitchen facilities on site, and catering can be arranged, kosher if desired. A business service concierge will assist with car rentals, taxis, limos, travel services and reservations for hotels, restaurants, theatres and sporting events. Parking is available in the building.

For further information, contact Carolyn Young, General Manager, The Hour Office, at (416) 214-2925, toll-free 1-800-328-5928, or fax (416) 214-2926.

Hilton (Chaim) Kagan, CA, MBA, is an investment advisor with RBC Dominion Securities, a member of the Royal Bank Group and full-service investment dealer. With over 400,000 retail clients, the firm considers the individual investor a key business source. Chaim focuses on helping clients reduce taxes and improve after-tax returns.

Spousal RRSPs offer good savings where a high-income spouse obtains the deduction, and the amount accumulates in the lower-income spouse's RRSP. Many people believe that at age 71, RRSP contributions must stop. This holds for your individual plan, but you can contribute to a spousal plan as long as the spouse is under 71 and you have earned income. The spouse can also contribute as long as he or she has earned income.

Another opportunity occurs when you retire from a company. You can roll a retirement allowance tax-free into an RRSP, up to $3,500 for each year you worked for the company.

The $8,000 per person over-contribution is another tax saving source. It is not worthwhile to maintain funds of, say, $16,000 per family outside an RRSP attracting tax, when these funds in an RRSP would be compounding tax-free. Though there is no deduction for over-contribution, it merits consideration if the funds are in the RRSP for at least 15 years.

Many other tax saving opportunities exist. It is Chaim Kagan's responsibility as an investment advisor with tax experience to alert clients to such opportunities. Please call Chaim on his private line, (416) 864-4067, for a complimentary evaluation of your investments.

Make your money work harder

Most Canadians recognize the importance of an RRSP in their tax planning. A Wood Gundy Self-Directed RRSP allows you to generate the ongoing tax-free growth you need to stay ahead of inflation and preserve purchasing power throughout your retirement years. Furthermore, a Wood Gundy RRSP not only helps you earn the best rate of return on your retirement savings by enabling you to make investments far beyond the scope of GIC or savings RRSP's offered by banks and trust companies, but also gives you maximum control of your investments and outstanding professional advice every step of the way.

For investments outside of an RRSP, Wood Gundy's Asset Advantage Account (AAA) links Wood Gundy's investment expertise with the banking services of the CIBC to create one convenient vehicle consolidating chequing, investment, and VISA services. AAA status entitles you to our best rates on Canadian (CIBC Cdn. Prime – 2% = 7.25%) and U.S. cash balances (CIBC U.S. Prime – 3% = 6.0%)*. Interest is earned daily and credited monthly. AAA offers convenient access to your assets with personalized Canadian and U.S. dollar cheques, and a no-fee CIBC VISA card. The AAA keeps you informed with an all-in-one monthly statement which gives you an overview of your personal financial situation and details all monthly activities.

GIVING TRUST
A WHOLE NEW MEANING

RRSP's – That time of year again

by Earl Crackower, Chartered Financial Consultant

Once again that frenzied time of year called "RRSP season" is upon us. I must admit that I have always had a problem relating RRSP to a season. After all, we are not trying to hunt deer or catch fish. What we are actually doing is saving for retirement. To me, this is not seasonal.

Our firm has always recommended to our RRSP clients that they purchase their RRSP at the beginning of the year, not sixty days after the calender year ends. By doing so, they will have a larger value in their RRSP by the time they retire. In the event that a lump sum is not available to contribute at the beginning of the year, we suggest making periodic contributions over the course of the year. In this way, RRSP contributions will start working sooner. When investments are purchased periodically, the investment return is averaged. For example, if Mutual Funds are purchased over a time period where funds are increasing in value, the periodic purchases will have various unit values. This probably will average out to a lower price than if one waited several months and made a lump sum purchase at a high unit price. The same principle works with investments in guaranteed interest vehicles.

When considering the purchase of an RRSP you should look at the other side of the transaction. There's more to buying an RRSP than running around looking for the best rate of return or lining up at a counter and having a stranger spend fifteen minutes in the planning process.

Proper RRSP planning takes time and effort. We keep seeing statistics indicating that regardless of how much you "plunk" into an RRSP, it's not going to be enough to do the job. It is so important to have a game plan and quality financial advice. You should not leave your retirement planning to chance. Objective, sound planning advice from a retirement specialist is just as essential as a good return on investment.

To learn how this process really works to the best advantage, please call to arrange a discussion at no cost or obligation.

Effective Yield 8.25%
Matures October 31, 2003 at U.S.$6,000
RRSP Foreign Content Eligible

A State of Israel Zero Coupon Bond is the best way to benefit from the dynamic economic growth of Israel while bringing foreign diversification to your self-directed RRSP.

Since 1951, Israel has issued over $15 billion (U.S.) in bonds. Israel has never defaulted or delayed on the repayment of interest or principal.

Today, the prospects for State of Israel Bonds are even better. Standard and Poor recently upgraded the nation's rating to BBB+. Israel is already an economic powerhouse; a leading supplier to the world of high tech and biotechnology products. Israel was a key participant at the recent Middle East/North Africa Economic Summit which laid the groundwork for a comprehensive peace and new business partnerships in the region. At peace, Israel will be the financial engine of an economically vibrant Middle East free-trade zone.

Zero Coupon Bonds are an ideal RRSP investment because they compound at a predetermined rate. With an effective yield of 8.25%, Israel's highly competitive Zero Coupon Bond will more than double your investment in just nine years. And the investment in U.S. dollars gives you a hedge against inflation.

Investing in Israel Bonds is the best way to encourage and benefit from the growth of Israel. And they add strength and diversity to any self-directed RRSP.

It's easy to establish a Self-Directed RRSP and add State of Israel Zero Coupon Bonds. For complete information, contact Canada-Israel Securities Ltd.

Yiddish play as timely as it was 100 years ago

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — This is the 79th season of New York's Folksbiene Playhouse, noted for presenting classic Yiddish theatre at 123 East 55th St.

The current production of Jacob Gordin's Mirele Efros, written about 100 years ago, is as timely today as it was then.

The drama deals with the clash between two dominant women, a rich mother and her daughter-in-law, with the son caught in the middle. It is a bittersweet family portrait, with wonderful Yiddish dialogue that evokes both laughter and tears. It's first rate entertainment.

This down-home drama stars 50-year stage veteran Zypora Spaisman as Mirele.

One of Yiddish theatre's leading actresses, Spaisman was born in Lublin and began her acting career at the Polish State Theatre at 10. She first played at the Folksbiene Playhouse in 1956, and has appeared in every Folksbiene performance since.

Spaisman is impeccably cast as Mirele, a character that touches the most intimate corners of your heart, especially when she conveys the widow's unhappiness.

The cast also features Mina Bern, who appeared in Barry Levinson's film Avalon and the Broadway hit Those Were The Days, Shifra Lerer, Felix Febich and Racquel Yossifon.

The play, faultlessly directed by Bryna Wasserman Turetsky, was adapted by the late Ida Kaminska. It is performed in Yiddish with simultaneous English translation by Hy Wolfe.

The show won't win a Pulitzer Prize, but is permeated with perfect moments of connection between actors and audience. Mirele Efros should delight adult audiences of all ages, genders and states of sobriety.

Tickets are priced from $20 to $25, and can be reserved by calling 212-755-2231. Limited run.

Hammer and Goodman Together: Hungarian-born violinist Moshe Hammer, who was raised in Israel and has performed with many major symphonies around the world, has been leader of the Toronto-based Amadeus Ensemble since its formation a decade ago. This month, Hammer and acclaimed harpist Erica Goodman of Toronto join forces when the Amadeus Ensemble gives a concert in the Glenn Gould Studio, Canadian Broadcasting Centre, Toronto, on Sunday Feb. 19 at 8 p.m.

"Both Moshe and Erica are world-class performers, and we are very excited about their appearance together," says the ensemble's general manager, Michael Boyd. According to Boyd, the CBC will be recording the concert for future broadcast on The Arts Tonight.

The program includes works by St. Saens, Spohr, Lasala, Polgar, Adaskin, Tournier and Bach. Tickets ($25 for adults) are available at the door or in advance by calling 416-205-5555.

Concertmaster Receives French Honor: Jacques Israelievitch, the congenial, beret-clad first violinist of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO), was honored at a concert late in January by being inducted into the Order of the Arts and Letters of France by the French consul general.

Born in the South of France at Cannes, Israelievitch was a penniless child prodigy who studied under the patronage of the Rothschild family and swept the first prizes at the Paris National Conservatory at age 16. Now 46 years old, he has been concertmaster of the TSO for almost seven years.

By attaining the rank of Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres, Israelievitch joins the ranks of such distinguished Canadians as author Margaret Atwood, filmmaker David Cronenberg and architect Carlos Ott.

Political Theatre: Eye On Arts takes belated note of Reading Hebron, a play by Jason Sherman that is described as "a thought-provoking and controversial look at the Hebron massacre." The work was offered last week as part of the Toronto theatrical festival Under the Umbrella.

According to a press release, "Sherman weaves a narrative about what he calls Israel's repression of its Palestinian population, the Palestinian response, and the moral responsibility of Jews outside of Israel for the actions of the Jewish State."

Stephen Cera fills seats at Yonge St. Recital Hall

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

NORTH YORK — Stephen Cera's job is to fill seats — both in the audience and on stage at the Recital Hall of North York's George Weston Recital Hall.

Born in Winnipeg, Cera, 43, is an accomplished critic, CBC music producer and pianist.

In 1991, Garth Drabinsky, CEO of Live Entertainment Inc. (Livent), asked him to become concert programmer of the 1,000-seat hall in the George Weston Recital Hall on north Yonge Street where Show Boat is now playing at the Apotex Theatre.

The Recital Hall's inaugural season began in November 1993 with a sell-out performance by soprano Kiri Te Kanawa, and featured almost 100 subscription events, to which more than 75,000 tickets were sold. Performers since then have included Art Garfunkel, Tony Bennett, Frederica von Stade, Kathleen Battle, Shlomo Mintz, Marilyn Horne — and Yitzhak Perlman and Pinchas Zukerman, who quickly sold out first one and then a second added concert.

Initially, Cera had to use his own and Drabinsky's good names in the entertainment business to entice such celebrated performers to commit themselves to playing in a concert hall that hadn't been built yet in a place most had never heard of.

"When I first came on board, we didn't have a centre — we hadn't even broken ground yet — and nobody knew what Livent was," Cera recalls.

North York's Recital Hall has roughly 35 to 40 per cent of the capacity of long-established venues like the century-old 2,600-seat Massey Hall and the newer 2,800-seat Roy Thomson Hall, both in downtown Toronto.

"Roy Thomson is a symphony hall — ours is a recital hall," Cera says. "It can accommodate a symphony orchestra but it is primarily designed for smaller-scale forces."

Since it opened, the Recital Hall's acoustics have been celebrated by performers and audience members alike. In early reviews, the acoustics garnered nearly as much praise as some of the performers who tested them. Pianist Anton Kuerti pronounced it "clearly the best hall in Toronto."

Recalling the hall's humble origins in the municipal backrooms of Mayor Mel Lastman's North York, Globe and Mail critic Robert Everett-Green noted that "a marriage of civic boosterism and entrepreneurial drive has somehow produced a compact concert hall of world-beating quality ... What might have proved a piece of suburban presumption has turned out to be a music hall, and a music series, that could claim a proud place in any city in the world."

For Cera, part of the challenge of filling the hall is in changing the deeply-entrenched habits of concert-goers who live in North York or the more northern Thornhill or Richmond Hill, but who, through custom, may prefer to hear concerts downtown.

He points out that the Recital Hall is convenient to both Highway 401 and the Yonge Street subway line and that, despite a lingering misconception to the contrary, the neighborhood offers a number of pre- and post-concert possibilities.

"North York has really changed. Now it's possible to have a first-rate evening out, with first-class dining as well as first-class music," he says.

As Livent's vice-president of concert music programing, Cera speaks almost daily with agents, publicists, producers and performers, and attends music festivals around the globe, searching for top names as well as new and underexposed talent worthy of sophisticated Toronto audiences.

"I'm very attracted to major young artists who have not had the exposure here. I'm giving them a platform in Canada's major city."

He designs each season's subscription series by combining a few major musical stars with lesser-known names, leaning on the drawing power of the celebrities to sell the whole package.

Many concerts at the Recital Hall have involved Russian-born Jewish performers such as Vladimir Ashkenazy, Vladimir Feltsman, Sharon Kam, Yuli Turovsky, Yefim Bronfman, Bella Davidovich, Vladinir Spivakov, Shlomo Mintz, Dmitry Sitkovetsky and members of the Borodin String Quartet, as well as other Jewish performers, including Rivka Golani, Menahem Pressier, Ofra Harnoy and Joseph Kalichstein.

Cera believes Livent may be the only private operator in North America that offers an annual series of classical music without government subsidies.

He says the Recital Hall is not yet swimming in profits but bolsters its income with community rentals. Its viability is assured by sponsorships from major corporations such as the Royal Bank.

The fact that Show Boat is drawing hundreds of people nightly helps the public become familiar with the venue, Cera notes. Having two theatres and a major concert hall under one roof "presents possibilities for cross-fertilization and mutual reinforcement that we're by no means finishing exploring. It's an exciting new development in arts presentation — its very cutting edge."

His top priority, he says, is to increase the hall's subscriber base, beginning by selling mass subscriptions for the 1995/96 concert series, to be announced March 7.

Winchell: Gossip, Power & the Culture of Celebrity, by Neal Gabler (Random House, $42).

In his heyday — 50 or 60 years ago — Walter Winchell (1897-1972) was one of the best known and most feared personalities in America. He invented the newspaper gossip column and must be regarded as the principal architect of the culture of celebrity and scandal in which we now live.

In 1925, at a time when editors of most newspapers were reluctant to publish even something as inoffensive as the notice of an impending birth for fear of crossing the boundaries of good taste, Winchell introduced a revolutionary column that reported on who was suffering from financial difficulties, which celebrities were having affairs, which couples were about to divorce — and dozens of other secret and juicy titbits that had previously been concealed from public view. For good or ill he singlehandedly expanded the purview of American journalism.

It is estimated that 50 million Americans — out of an adult population of roughly 75 million — either listened to his weekly radio broadcast or read his daily column, which was syndicated in more than 2,000 newspapers.

Born into a poor Manhattan Jewish family, Winchell rose above his depressing immigrant environment via vaudeville and then journalism. He called himself an "intuitive" Jew, although he was far removed from either Judaism or its rituals. He had a radar-like sensitivity to anti-Semitism. As early as 1933 he recognized the danger of Hitler, far earlier and with greater prescience than most of the political pundits of the time. In 1934, the B'nai Brith organization named him one of its five honorees for the Hall of Fame. It declared that no one had contributed as much as he toward laughing the Nazis and what they stood for off the map.

In the first half of his career Winchell was a a staunch New Dealer with a profound and exuberant admiration for Franklin Roosevelt. But after his hero's death, he became a rabid reactionary — a follower of the odious Joseph McCarthy, and a basher of communism.

One of Winchell's most publicized and notorious successes occurred in 1939 with his "capture" of Louis "Lepke" Buchalter who J. Edgar Hoover called "the most dangerous criminal in the United States." After complicated negotiations, the gangster surrendered to Winchell who triumphantly presented him to the authorities. It was a sensational coup which was overshadowed only by World War II which broke out a week later.

Winchell's final years were sad. His popularity faded. Television passed him by. He was bedeviled by family and financial problems.

This meticulously researched biography by Neal Gabler, author of An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood, is continually engrossing. It is not just the story of the rise and fall of an astonishing man, but also an entertaining and informative account of the state and transformation of the media in the middle years of the century — a thick slice of illuminating cultural history.

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

NEGRIL, Jamaica — There are two ways to experience Jamaica. One is to check into a modestly priced, beach-front hotel that may not have a telephone, TV or radio in the room, and mingle with the locals at reggae clubs and beef patty stands to get an up close, personal feel for a country that throbs with life.

The other is to hermetically seal oneself inside an all-inclusive resort, and from morning to night, be shamelessly pampered with drinks with little umbrellas in them hurried to poolside, then a leisurely game of tennis, followed perhaps by a massage and facial.

Both approaches are recommended.

For Jamaica is something of a paradox: at once alluring for its rich history and culture, in which all Jamaicans seem conversant; and attractive for its emphasis on pure relaxation, far from the madding crowds.

This is a place to explore, to discover, to hike in, to sweat in. It's also where the milk-skinned North American can totally veg out, soak up those precious rays, then tuck into a candlelit dinner with white-glove service. A king-sized bed and in-room HBO then beckon.

Jamaica's epicentre of do-as-you-please is Negril, until recently, one of the country's best-kept secrets. Nestled on the island's western tip, Negril is, no matter how cliched it sounds, an oasis of sugar-textured beaches, lush vegetation and breathtaking sunsets.

The range of accommodations is wide — from the ultra swank chain of SuperClubs to a hammock in a thatched hut. In between are well-appointed smaller resort hotels such as Negril Gardens, the Tree House, Foote Prints on the Sand, Xtabi and the more stripped-down Negril Inn, where in-room telephones, TVs and radios are eschewed.

But almost all of the mid-range resorts offer water sports, decent meals, evening entertainment and air-conditioned rooms, either beach-front or garden view. Winter rates are typically in the $125-$175 (US) per night range, based on double occupancy.

If you venture out, a reggae club is recommended, with De Buss and Rick's the popular spots. If you don't work up a sweat in these places, see a mortician.

On the high end are the SuperClubs, the all-inclusive places, with the accent on all. Places like the Grand Lido, Sandals, Swept Away and Hedonism seem to compete with each other over which can be the most luxurious, the most accommodating. Whichever you pick, you're in for a treat.

The Grand Lido, with its stunning use of marble, glass, mini waterfalls and bright flowers, harkens back to the age of the resort where guests' fingers were not lifted. Fronted on a prime stretch of pristine beach, the Grand Lido, like its sister resort, the Sans Souci Lido in Ocho Rios, is not cheap. Beachfront junior suites are $1,090 (US) for three nights, while one bedroom suites go for $1,260 for three nights in the winter months. But that includes all meals, sports and amenities, and if you're given to pampering yourself, it's considered reasonable.

Ditto at Swept Away, where the vegetation is so thick, you may need a machete. Swept Away prides itself on its amenities, which include all water and land sports, unlimited drinks, aerobics and recently, golf. About the only thing a guest would pay for is a massage and beauty treatments. Winter rates range from $1,395 for three nights in a garden suite, to $3,780 for seven nights in a beachfront suite.

Then there's Hedonism, where the name says its all. Here, guides say with a wink, anything goes for the singles only crowd. Sandals Negril is for couples only.

Probably the most original place to stay is Tensing Pen Village, for the more adventurous. An echanting little property in Negril's hip west end, this is an unspoiled tropical paradise that is more Polynesian than Caribbean. Touted as a nature retreat, the idyllic setting features secluded thatched cottages — some perched on pillars — amid lush foliage and the lovely cacophony of exotic birds. Guests get around using small foot paths, while swimming is off cliffs into the pounding surf below. This is the place to check out of civilization for a while. Rates start at $90 per night for a bungalow.

CJN reporter Ron Csillag visited Jamaica recently as a guest of the Jamaica Tourist Board. Air travel was provided by Air Canada, which flies a 747 to Kingston and Montego Bay daily.

Flea Market in Jaffa has immense appeal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

JAFFA — From a purely esthetic point of view, the Flea Market here is not the most enchanting place in Israel.

Set amid a jumble of crumbling buildings in what was once an Arab residential quarter, it is nothing if not vibrant.

Approaching it from Jerusalem Boulevard, Jaffa's main thoroughfare, you follow Olei Zion Street, past workshops, shoe stores, a pita bakery and two barber shops, until you reach the heart of the market.

The sidewalks are filled with hawkers peddling everything under the sun — sinks, faucets, toilet bowls, cheap fur coats, second-hand shirts and pants, vinyl records, old coins, kitschy oil canvases.

There is a musty smell in the air, testifying to the vintage of the goods on sale.

A car, crammed to the roof with video cassettes, is parked on a corner. Its owner waits silently, hoping someone will stop and buy.

Nearby, in dark shops filled with antique furniture, merchants sit on stools, drinking mint tea or Turkish coffee, usually while dragging on cigarettes.

Much of this furniture will probably end up in the smart salons of North Tel Aviv, one of the most affluent neighborhoods in town.

My wife, Etti, who loves the market, would dearly like to buy a piece for our home in Toronto. Alas, she cannot. The shipping cost would simply be prohibitive.

We turn right, into a crowded street lined with handicraft shops specializing in decorative plates, samovars, coffee sets, wooden camels, swords and daggers, jewelry and menorahs.

Lauren, my 12-year-old daughter, pores over the jewelry but finds nothing appealing. She settles for a bowl with a Jerusalem motif, a gift for her teacher.

We wander on, passing furniture workshops with the heady smell of glue, varnish and new-cut wood. The weathered Arab-style buildings, with their wrought-iron balconies and green shutters, conjure up a long-gone era.

Carpet dealers are ubiquitous. Strolling by one shop stacked high with aging carpets, I pause next to a car that is nearly covered with an exquisite Persian rug.

The dealer, an Iranian Jew who immigrated to Israel shortly after the 1979 Islamic revolution, is repairing the 150-year-old piece for a customer who's just bought it for a cool $10,000.

37 YEARS OF SUCCESS

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

Jewish Feminist Weekend: "It's been an extremely important vehicle in helping me reconnect with my identity in a meaningful way," says Temi Firsten about the Jewish feminist study group that she has been involved with for more than three years.

Now Firsten is organizing a weekend retreat for Jewish feminists at the Maple Lake Resort in Parry Sound, Ont., from March 3 to 5. Author Sandra Butler, who is active in the Jewish renewal movement and has spoken to groups on three continents, is the facilitator.

"Women have experienced Judaism differently than men," says Firsten. "The essence has been exclusion from language and ritual and that has fostered a sense of marginality. Sandra is extremely effective in creating a safe forum for exploration."

For information and registration, call Firsten at 416- 656-5650.

Snowmobiling in Haliburton: If you're one of those people who just can't get enough of snow, then try visiting the privately-owned Haliburton Forest & Wild Life Reserve. Here you will find some 50,000 acres of snowy white vista and more than 300 km of perfectly groomed and well-marked trails. Until April, snowmobilers and other winter enthusiasts may utilize a change house, warming shelters along the trail system, overnight accommodations, a restaurant, and other facilities.

"We take great pains to ensure that snowmobilers act responsibly in the best interest of nature and wildlife," says owner-manager Peter Schleifenbaum. "We have strict regulations when it comes to drinking, excessive noise, reckless behavior, littering, trespassing and driving on sensitive terrain. We firmly believe that most of the negative impact that snowmobiling may have on the environment is caused by the actions of the snowmobiler, not the machine."

For a report of trail conditions, call 1-800-267-4482. For other information on the Haliburton Forest & Wild Life Reserve, phone 705-754-2198.

Travel Talk urges snowmobilers to exercise extreme caution and obey all public warnings regarding travel on frozen lakes, as thin ice could result in fatalities.

British Airways Sale: British Airways has introduced major air fare reductions from Canada to some 39 cities in Britain, Europe and beyond at savings of up to 58 per cent. "From Toronto, for instance, round-trip to Tel Aviv would be $967, down 28 per cent from the lowest advance purchase for a saving of $371," said John Wood, the airline's vice-president and general manager for Canada.

Other examples: a round-trip fare to Istanbul is $965, a saving of $375, and to Maurituius $1,792, a saving of $2,404. The sale continues through March 31. All travel is via London and fares are based on current exchange rates. Further information may be obtained from travel agents or by calling the airline toll-free at 800-AIRWAYS.

Art and Culture in Australia: Ancient aboriginal rock paintings and modern dance and music are all part of the artistic wealth and cultural diversity of Australia that the Australian Tourist Commission is celebrating in a five-year marketing plan. Enjoying the sounds of the didjeridoo; listening to stories of the aboriginal dreamtime; dancing to authentic Australian bush music; attending a festival; or watching world-class opera and ballet are just a few of the activities awaiting visitors.

"The purpose of the theme years is to educate travelers about Australia's special interest events and activities," said Lyndel Gray, regional director of the ATC for the Americas. "We are appealing to the traveler who wants to see natural attractions, learn about the people and enjoy a range of cultural experiences on their vacation."

For information on Australia, telephone 800-333-9262.

Doctor In The House: This is the apt name of a London-based organization specializing in providing accommodation in private houses or apartments for medical personnel visiting London for conferences, meetings, examinations and clinical attachments. Owned by professional people, the properties are located near major hospitals, colleges and conference centres. Short-term rates for four or more nights are $55 per night for a single room ($84.60 for a double), including continental breakfast. Doctor in the House, 19 Sispara Gardens, London SW18 1LG. Telephone 081-870-5949; fax 081-877-3464.

Israeli hotels equal to others

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM—The service in hotels here can be favorably compared to that in competing countries, Israel Hotel Association president Michael Federman said last week.

However, it is due as much to the deterioration of service abroad as the improvement here. Federman cited Tourism Ministry surveys of departing tourists, which showed that the overwhelming majority were satisfied with service in hotels here. He added that as a frequent traveller, he can testify to the fact that service standards in other countries have gone down.

A Man of G-d

Six months have now passed since that dark day of Tammuz 3, and we have yet to find relief from the pain and the immense sense of loss we are experiencing. Still, we know that the Rebbe would not allow us to indulge in sorrow, but instead, have us direct our emotions into positive, constructive and fruitful activities. In the Rebbe's words, we must "turn pain into action." These words reverberate in our ears as we go to press with a new issue of Lubavitch International.

The Talmud and Kabbalah are replete with allusions to the eternal life of the righteous. These point not only to the immortality of the soul, which is true of every soul, but beyond that—to the soul's continued impact on our world, in ways even more pronounced than during the physical—and therefore confining—life of the tzaddik.

But there are singular individuals of whom still greater immortality is true. One of these is Moses, about whom the Talmud says that "he did not die." (Sotah 13:b) The Kabbalah interprets this to mean that some of the sparks of Moses's soul are reincarnated in the lives of every Jewish leader of all subsequent generations.

There are many parallels to be drawn between Moses and the Rebbe: Each led the nation for four decades; each accorded the lost and stray sheep genuine significance; each nurtured a vision of the Jewish people redeemed, and each embodied infinite love for the Jewish people. Alas, we see striking similarities in the full pathos and poignancy of their last days, when, after devoting every breathing moment of their lives to lead the Jewish people ever so painstakingly towards a new reality, both are allowed only to glimpse from afar their dream fulfilled. In that penultimate moment—as Moses's vision seems just a handbreadth away and the Jewish people are about to enter the Land of Israel, their great leader and visionary is withdrawn from the world. In our own time, the Rebbe, our great leader and visionary, is withdrawn from this world just as he coaxes it ever so close to the Redemption.

In the days immediately following Tammuz 3, the eyes of the world were upon the Lubavitch community. "How will they cope now?" seemed to be the question on the lips of every journalist and every social scientist.

Anyone who ever visited the Rebbe was curious about the way we, his Chassidim hovered close to him, how we followed his every move, how we found much significance and inspiration in the wave of his hand, the nod of his head, and the smile on his luminous face. These were the movements of an individual who could and did empower people all over the world to undertake the bold and innovative programs for which Chabad-Lubavitch has earned its reputation. These were the movements of an individual who could find light within the greatest darkness, expose beauty within the harshest ugliness, and uncover warmth in the coldest of places.

People who observed the Rebbe were confounded by his schedule. They marveled at his incredible stamina. How else to explain his refusal to take a single day off in more than four decades; his late night appointments that stretched into the morning hours as he attended to the personal problems and heartaches of his people; the days spent each week fasting, as he prayed at his father's-in-law resting place on behalf of his people and humanity at large; the long hours spent teaching us and enlightening us with his wisdom, his insights and his divine vision; and in later years, when his flock grew by hundreds of thousands and the demand on his time far exceeded its supply, the long hours—six or seven hours—he stood, in the ninth decade of his life, on ailing feet, so that he could personally greet each of the thousands of individuals, Jew and non-Jew, child and adult, who sought his blessing on any given Sunday, and give them a dollar so that they, in turn, would have the mitzvah of giving charity. Surely this was not the stamina of a mortal being.

The myriad ways in which he has tended our wounds, nurtured our dreams, and sustained us, collectively and individually, will never be fully told. But through his unified existence, through his deep sensitivity to human suffering and pain, through his vision for a world perfected and his work towards its realization—from his earliest calls to education—both Jewish and universal, until his most recent efforts to educate the world about the Redemption—the Rebbe has stirred our passions for the good and the G-dly, and taught us to manifest these in our lives, our reality and our world. Surely this could not be the work of one mortal life span.

Indeed, our relationship with the Rebbe can never be defined in terms of his physical being alone. For just as Moses was to the Jews of the Exodus, mortal yet clearly a man of G-d, so the Rebbe is to us: So that while we are handicapped by the loss of his physical presence, while we suffer the pain of a truncated limb and are made awkward and clumsy by this great loss, the Rebbe's life has not ended. Rather, it continues to breathe palpably in the work of Chabad-Lubavitch, and in the lives of the Rebbe's emissaries around the world in the minds and hearts of each of us.

WHILE WE SUFFER THE PAIN OF A TRUNCATED LIMB AND ARE MADE AWKWARD AND CLUMSY BY THIS GREAT LOSS, THE REBBE'S LIFE HAS NOT ENDED.

Whether we consider the institutions of Jewish learning and tradition he established, or the visibility of traditional Jewish life today in America and abroad as he inspired it, or the various social, educational and humanitarian activities he initiated, or the number of lives he affected through any and all of these, the Rebbe's life shall endure, eternally.

And through the continued global activities of Chabad-Lubavitch, his shluchim, and too, all of the many people who carry his inspiration within themselves, in their charitable, educational and spiritual activities, shall continue to share in that eternal life. It is therefore, in the continued and enhanced work of Chabad-Lubavitch that we take our greatest comfort and consolation. Through these activities, and with every soul that is touched, we may discern the Rebbe's presence, his nod of encouragement, his reassuring smile, and his blessings. These will continue to sustain us as we carry on with his work, bringing redemption to a tired and aching world.

LITTLE SHUL THAT COULD

IF WALLS COULD SPEAK, THE FOUR EXTERIOR WALLS THAT REMAIN OF the Marina Roscha Synagogue would speak volumes. If walls could cry, they would shed a sea of tears. For what transpired inside these walls during a period of close to seventy years, through nods and winks and code words, at risk of death and for the love of Jews, are events at times so surreal, at others, so miraculous, they can only leave us in awe of the enduring power of the Jewish soul.

People do cry, and cry they did last December morning, when they arrived at the famed Marina Roscha Synagogue and found it a charred shell. "The elderly men arrived for prayer, as they have every morning for many years, and they wept—like babies," says its Rabbi, Rabbi Berel Lazar. They would; when all else was bleak and gray, during the long years of communism, it was here, at the Marina Roscha shul—the only Jewish holdout for so many—where the fires of yiddishkeit were kept burning, and the memories, the warmth and the familiarity of Jewish traditions were kept alive. It was for their individual and collective history, for the secret triumphs and joys they've known inside the shul—now made into a black ruin by an arsonist's hands—that they cried bitter tears.

AP/Sergei Karpukhin

Rabbi Mendel Cunin and a Moscow fireman sift through the scorched prayer books.

In 1926, wanting to save face after it shut down the last shul in Moscow, the communist government granted the congregants permission to build their own shul—not believing they would ever succeed. They did, however, and a small, wood frame building which would become the center for Jewish activity over the next six decades, was built, in the Marina Roscha Section of Moscow. As the only synagogue that was not run by KGB moles, it seemed a more secure place than others, although here too, one could never know for sure which one out of every three fellows in a talit was preparing for a briefing with the KGB later that day.

Israel's victory in the Six-Day-War sparked a strong spiritual revival among Russia's Jewish youth, and many were drawn to the Marina Roscha shul. There they found Reb Getcha Wilensky, a devoted Chasid, who, with great consequences to his personal life, helped clear a path for them back to Judaism. "The shul was always packed with people," says Rabbi Lazar. And during the hungry years of communism, the shul's kitchen was kept open through the food smuggled in by Lubavitch in the Free World. It was here, under the suspicious eyes of undercover KGB agents, that thousands of brissin and chuppahs were arranged, always through an ostensibly benign exchange of words that were actually full of import as to the time and place where these forbidden activities would take place.

Even before the fall of communism, the Marina Roscha shul had opened a yeshiva. "Things under Gorbachev were getting easier, and we had a number of local students who wanted to study Torah," explains Rabbi Lazar, who visited Moscow as a student in 1987. "The Rebbe encouraged us to open a yeshiva, and we simply notified the government." The yeshiva opened in the Marina Roscha, with some 20 students, ranging in age from 16-50.

Shortly thereafter, a school, Achei Tmimim, was opened, and until last year, when enrollment grew to nearly 400 students, it too, was housed in the small wood frame building.

Under Gorbachev, the brissin the chuppahs and all other Jewish activities were held in the shul, which in effect, became a bustling Chabad House. Many Jews were emigrating to Israel, and the shul offered an Ulpan in Hebrew. "We had 200 people during the course of a day, coming through the shul," says Rabbi Lazar. That, he adds, was in addition to the yeshiva and the school. "It became the one-stop address for Jews who needed anything from a kosher meal to a crash course in Hebrew reading. With the fall of communism—much more became possible, and things at Marina Roscha were blissfully hectic.

It took 20 fire engines, 200 firemen and four hours to put the blaze out in the pre-dawn hours of a grey December morning. Rabbi Lazar, who was called by one of the students sleeping in a flat on the grounds of the shul, pleaded with the firemen to salvage the Torah scrolls. "When they determined where the ark was, they assured me that the Torahs were surely burnt,

PEOPLE DO CRY, AND CRY THEY DID LAST DECEMBER MORNING, WHEN THEY ARRIVED AT THE MARINA ROSCHA SHUL AND FOUND IT A CHARRED SHELL.

The Mikvah the KGB Built

In the mid 1980s, Lubavitch renovated the Marina Roscha building. Part of the renovations included the construction of a mikvah—something forbidden by the government. It was during the "nine-days" —a period of mourning on the Jewish calendar leading up to the ninth of Av which is commemorated, among other ways, by deferring all joyous events, including construction of a new house, or new facilities. To the surprise of everyone involved with the Marina Roscha shul at the time, the Rebbe insisted that they continue with construction during those days, and urged them to complete it quickly.

David Blumenfeld

Later, the people of Marina Roscha learned that the KGB had a stakeout across the street. "All the agents were on a week-long holiday during the nine days," says Rabbi Lazar. It was only their absence that made it possible to construct the mikvah—as apparently the Rebbe alone had known.

Indeed, just as it was completed, the agents returned from their holiday, and paid the shul a visit. Using health reasons as a pretext, they declared the mikvah illegal, filled it with cement, and as a finishing touch, put fine parquet flooring over it. Meanwhile, back in the States, the issue gained the interest of senators and congressmen who lobbied to have the mikvah reopened.

The efforts proved effective, and the KGB agreed to allow the mikvah to be reopened. But now, the shul insisted, it was the KGB's responsibility to undo the damage it had done. "You closed it—now you have to open it," the Chasidim told them. "The next day they arrived with the necessary equipment, dug out the cement, and repaired the mikvah," chuckles Rabbi Lazar.

And the parquet floor? That was preserved and installed on the bimah — a reminder of the KGB's inadvertent participation in the building of the Marina Roscha shul.

Karl Schatz

THE ONLY JEWISH HOLDOUT WHERE THE FIRES OF YIDDISHKEIT WERE KEPT BURNING

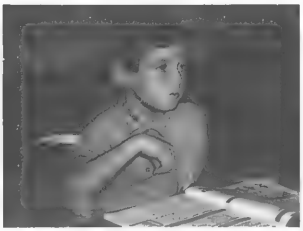
and there was no way anyone would go through the flames to retrieve them," says Rabbi Lazar.

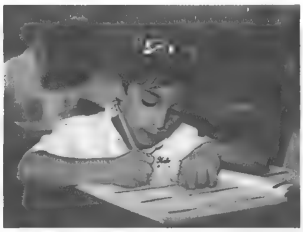
After the fire, Rabbi Lazar made his way through the remains of the warped and burnt shul, hoping to find something salvageable. What he found, to his utter disbelief, were the ark and all the Torah scrolls, intact. "They were not damaged by the fire or the water," he says.

Two days later, huddled and freezing in a makeshift shul on the grounds of the Marina Roscha, the congregants vowed amongst themselves, to rebuild their Synagogue bigger and better then ever before.

While the government drags its feet investigating the fire, Rabbi Lazar and the members of the shul are raising funds to build a multi-million dollar complex which will house everything—including facilities for the 500 brissin it does each year, the soup kitchen and the yeshiva, to name just a few of the many activities that have been displaced by the fire and are now operating out of temporary facilities. To date, more than 1000 people are affiliated with the Marina Roscha shul. Once the center is completed, says Rabbi Lazar, he expects that many more of Moscow's 100,000 Jews will find their way to the shul—the starting point towards a life filled with the joys of Judaism.

AN ACADEMY





ZIPPING ALONG ON INTERSTATE 95, RABBI Y. Biston's mind is racing as well. As director of Chabad-Lubavitch activities in Broward and South Palm Beach, Florida, Rabbi Biston oversees a wide variety of projects and programs spread out over the Broward County area.

There's no knowing where he is at any given time but a peculiar habit places him at the Shepard Broad Hebrew Academy of N. Broward and S. Palm Beach every day at 3:45. He doesn't even get out of his car, so long as he can watch as the 250 children file out of their classrooms for dismissal. "I get such pleasure watching them," he says. "It gives me real nachas to see them go home at the end of another successful school day."

Many of these children, he explains, would have likely never ended up with a Jewish education were it not for the Hebrew Academy.

Its newly acquired building, formerly a shopping mall, sits just off Route 441 in Margate, a 10 minute commute from Coral Springs, where many of the school's students live. Set on 2½ acres of land, the 30,000 square foot building has bright, airy, beautifully decorated classrooms, each with its own bathroom.

It is the third move for the Hebrew Academy, which opened in 1986 with a handful of children in the living room of Rabbi Yossi Denburg, principal of Shepard Broad Hebrew Academy.

As the school grew, Chabad-Lubavitch bought a building in Coral Springs. That was fine for several years, until 1992, when the school's growth could no longer be contained in the 4,000 square foot building.

The school encompasses nursery through seventh grade. "I think it is fair to say that the school's outstanding academic quality and its ability to attract a broad diversity of students has a lot to do with our professional administration and staff," says Rabbi Biston.

Its accreditation by the Association of Independent Schools of Florida—the highest level of accreditation —means that the schools' teachers are skilled and certified, and the facilities feature all the amenities including an activity center and a computer lab.

In addition to a stimulating Jewish studies curriculum prepared by Rabbi Yossi and Rivka Denburg, music, music appreciation, gymnastics and language arts, give the students a well-rounded educational experience.

Yosef Bliskow, a sixth grader who moved from the East Coast with his family several years ago, greets Rabbi Biston in the school yard. "I'm doing much better now," he tells Rabbi Biston.

Yosef had been to other schools before switching to the Hebrew Academy. "I like it here because I'm Jewish and all the other kids here are Jewish too," he says. "Also," he admits readily, "I've learned how to behave better here." Yosef will be among the first students of Hebrew Academy's Middle School, the new division for grades 7-9, which opened this September with its first class.

Twice As Nice

NO, THEY'RE NOT TWINS; in fact, they're not even brothers. But in so many other ways, the two rabbis bring the Doublemint twins to mind. Chipper and full of humor, they were invited by Rabbi Biston in 1992 to serve adjacent communities of Palm Beach County. "These were areas with large Jewish populations, and literally nothing in terms of an Orthodox Jewish shul," observes Rabbi Biston. Serving, the Central and West Boca Raton communities, Rabbi Zalman Bukiet's shul is in the Boca Hampton's mall, and Rabbi Moshe Denburg's, in the Polo Club Shops mall. They each have about sixty people at their Shabbat services, and about 250 people on Rosh HaShana and Yom Kippur. They plan joint events and even make their annual dinner together. If one's not around, you can always call the other.

Asked about their most impressive accomplishments since their arrival, and Rabbi Bukiet's reply sounds like an excerpt from Harper's Index: "We've supplied more than $18,000 worth of mezuzot, koshered more than 30 homes, distributed close to 500 pounds of shmura matzah, and provide at least a thousand Chanukah menorahs annually."

Those are the details. But they make up an incredibly grand total for the Jews of Palm Beach.

million dollars, was a good investment, giving Chabad of N. Broward and S. Palm Beach a comfortable facility for all of its functions, year round.

Everything from its Gan Israel summer and winter day camps to its popular Passover matzah bakery and pre-Rosh Hashana shofar factory, have become annual highlights for children from virtually all of the area's Jewish schools. The large activity hall also doubles as a synagogue every Shabbat, and communal Passover seders for 100 people are conducted there as well.

In 1978, there was no Orthodox Judaism in Palm Beach County. Today, shoppers in tennis shorts and sunhats browsing through the posh boutiques of the Polo Club Shops, stop in at Chabad, a Judaica shop that makes everything from silver menorahs to a Shabbat minyan available. "The shop is an unbelievable draw," says Mrs. Rivkah Denburg, who manages it.

"Whether they come in for a Bar-Mitzvah gift, or some Jewish reading material, they inevitably wind up spending a good deal of time here learning about Judaism and what Chabad can offer them," she says.

THE SPIRIT & THE LAW

GREAT THINGS HAPPEN WHEN bridges are built. Last year at the National Conference on Jewish and Contemporary Law, co-sponsored by North County Chabad Center in Yorba Linda, California, and the Loyola Law School, such a bridge was built during a weekend of debate and discussion between lawyers, judges and rabbis.

Rabbi David Eliezrie, director of N.C.C.C. who organized the conference, says the event created a "forum for the comparative analysis of important public policy issues under Jewish and secular law." Among the distinguished panelists and speakers were Professor Alan Dershowitz of Harvard Law School, Judge Stanley Mosk, senior Justice of the California Supreme Court, and Professor Irving Breitowitz of the University of Maryland. Sheila Prell Sonnenshine, Associate Justice of the California Court of Appeal who co-chaired the conference said that the conference used the "three-millenia old tradition of Jewish law to shed light on many of the important legal challenges."

Topics covered were of controversial and far reaching interest, including Euthanasia, Church and State, Gender Bias, Hate Crimes, and other issues. The three-day conference which convened on a weekend to include an inspirational Shabbat celebration, was well attended by some 300 lawyers, judges and legal scholars, as well as some community lay people.

Conference Co-Chairman Marshal Pearlman attributed the success of the conference to the disillusionment by lawyers with "the decline of the profession into a market driven business. Material success has not produced satisfaction or peace of mind. The fundamental relationships between man and G-d, and man and man are explored to help explain the origins of our law, why we need them and the extent to which they should be part of our lives."

The idea for the conference all began when Rabbi David Eliezrie had trouble convincing the local authorities to exempt the Chabad House's property from taxes. Rabbi Eliezrie consulted Michael Rubin, a prominent lawyer, who resolved the problem. Lawyer and rabbi found they shared common concerns, and a monthly Talmud Seminar for the local legal community was established.

One thing led to another, and before long, Rabbi Eliezrie had organized the first conference. "This year," Rabbi Eliezrie promised, "the third conference will bring together two worlds in a bigger way than in years past. The conference will explore issues as far-reaching as Church and State, Sexual Harassment, Gun Control, Health Care, Immigration and Legal Ethics.

This year's conference will be headlined by Justice Antonin Scalia of The United States Supreme Court, and Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, the world renowned talmudic scholar. The conference will take place in Irvine, California from March 31 through April 3, 1995.

Lawyers participating in the Conference will receive MCLE Credit. This year's conference is being sponsored by the National Institute of Jewish and Contemporary Law, one of the 93 new institutions founded since the passing of the Rebbe last June.

"Our intention was to create a Jewish consciousness and spark an awareness so that the community would develop Jewish institutions and programs necessary to its growth."

But then, in 1986 when Rabbi Mordechai and Goldie Avtzon came to Hong Kong, things began to change for Joe. "Mordechai upset my whole life," says Joe, only half in jest. Suddenly, there was a Shabbat minyan, a daily minyan, kosher food—and it was no longer so difficult to live Jewishly here.

According to Rabbi Avtzon, Hong Kong's Jewish community, with a population of 2000—composed of 30 nationalities, is one of the most diverse Jewish communities in the world. On any given Shabbat at the Chabad Shul, which is located in Hong Kong's Hilton Hotel, one can find an eclectic mix of Jews from seven continents and all levels of Jewish identity. "For example," says Rabbi Avtzon, "last Shabbat we had approximately 75 people in shul, 60 of whom were from overseas." And this past Rosh Hashana, the Lubavitch shul had one Sephardic minyan and an Ashkenazic one, with a total of close to 200 people.

Yossel Wohlhendler, an observant Jew from New York, is a repeat visitor to Hong Kong. "What's especially beautiful about Chabad in Hong Kong," he says, "is that everyone, from the Chasid in peyot to the unaffiliated, are joined together and greeted with the Avtzons' special warmth and hospitality."

Typically, explains Rabbi Avtzon, a family will settle in Hong Kong for about five years, before returning to the West. "The level of Jewish awareness here was really lacking," he says. "Our job is to get people to pause and realize that Judaism cannot be put on hold for five years. We do this by awakening them to their yiddishkeit, here—in Hong Kong."

To do that, Rabbi and Mrs. Avtzon have planted a variety of Jewish educational and religious programs, covering the gamut from Passover seders to overnight summer camps in the hills of Bombay.

But, as Rabbi Avtzon is quick to emphasize, Chabad did not come to Hong Kong to establish its own community. "Our intention was to create a Jewish consciousness and spark an awareness so that the community would develop Jewish institutions and programs necessary to its growth."

In this way, the Avtzons have served as a catalyst for much of what defines the Hong Kong Jewish community today, from its kosher eateries, to, most notably, the first Jewish school in the history of the Far East, The Carmel School, a primary school for children up to age seven with an enrollment of 75.

Rabbi Avtzon serves on the school's board, and Mrs. Avtzon serves as director of its Jewish program. Rabbi Avtzon also serves as Chairman of the Education Committee.

Lubavitch in the Far East, that we are able to entertain the activities we have here," says Rabbi Avtzon. "Without their support we couldn't think of doing many of the inspirational events and educational programs we bring to the community.

In addition, to their full range of activities and responsibilities, the Avtzons find themselves heavily involved in tutoring their own children to assure them a strong Torah education. They typically work 12-15 hours a day. But the work is rewarding, and the successes seem to spur them on to keep expanding. With three shuls, two kosher restaurants, 100 kosher-keeping families and a Jewish school, Rabbi Avtzon bets that life in Hong Kong is more Jewish than many places in the West.

"I credit all these changes to the Avtzons," says Joe. "They are caring and non-judgmental," and, he says, they've created "competition" for quality Jewish services in Hong Kong that makes it a viable place to live.

es led by the Avtzons and a beautiful, four-color magazine, L.I.F.E.—an acronym for Lubavitch in the Far East—which is circulated throughout all of Asia.

As representatives of Chabad in the Far East, the Avtzons attend to the needs of Jews in all parts of this region. Recently, it opened its first satellite Chabad House in the suburbs of Bombay Tahne, which will serve the Jewish community of Tahne. Fighting intermarriage is high on their priority list, and the Avtzons have brought Jewish awareness programs to Japan, Singapore, Thailand, Taiwan and the Philippines.

Of course, the Avtzons have tremendous hurdles to overcome, not least of which is the staggering cost of living in Hong Kong, where rent is among the highest in the world. In this British Crown colony in Southeast China, a month's rent for a standard apartment is typically $10,000. "It is only because of the dedication and support of the friends of Chabad-

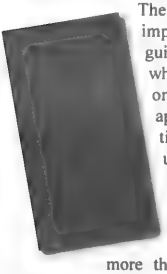
World-wide Directory of Lubavitch Centers

A directory of all Chabad-Lubavitch institutions around the globe was published in conjunction with the semi-annual meeting of the Machne Israel Development Fund, held in New York on March 15, 1993. The directory, printed exclusively in a special limited edition for the members of the Fund, listed reference information on the more than 2,000 educational, outreach, and social service institutions maintained and directed by Chabad-Lubavitch worldwide.



The demand for this impressive, 192 page guide grew to a point where the need for a second edition became apparent. This new edition includes the updated and revised 1994 information on the Chabad-Lubavitch global network of institutions. The more than 100 new institutions have been established since the 1993 edition, and are listed in this edition.

Provided in this institutional reference guide is the location and contact information of the Chabad-Lubavitch facilities and services in forty-three States in the United States and thirty-nine countries around the world. An extremely useful resource for the business traveler and tourist alike, this directory will make a thoughtful gift for any Jewish family.

The directory is now available to the public. To order: Call (718) 778 0226.

President of Uruguay Honored

At a gala affair at the New York Hilton this past September, Dr. Luis Lacalle, the president of Uruguay, was honored by Friends of Lubavitch in Uruguay. Among the guests attending the event were distinguished community and business leaders from the U.S., Canada, Israel, Argentina and of course, Uruguay.

The guest of honor, Dr. Lacalle, greeted the audience and spoke about the significant work which Lubavitch of Uruguay has accomplished, and recalled his encounter with the Rebbe in 1989. The president received a standing ovation when he withdrew a dollar bill—the one that he received from the Rebbe at that time, and which he carries with him at all times.

Rabbi Eliezer Shemtov, Director of Lubavitch in Uruguay, presented the president with a shofar. He discussed the symbolism of the shofar as representing critical points in Jewish history, with the final one being the shofar blasts that will be sounded with the coming of Moshiach.

Upon receiving the award and much to the delight of everyone present, the President proceeded to blow the shofar.

Others honored at the event included Mr. and Mrs. Peretz Friedberg of Toronto, Canada; Mr. and Mrs. Salomon of Montevideo, Uruguay; Mr. and Mrs. Felipe Weiser of Punta del Este, Uruguay, and Mr. and Mrs. Eduardo Elsztain of Buenos Aires, Argentina.

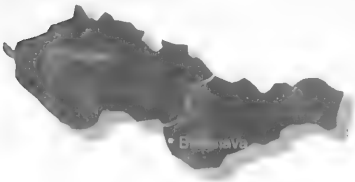
Here Come the Judges

They know what American law has to say about any number of issues, but the group of Civil Supreme and Apellate Term Judges in Borough Hall, Brooklyn, want to explore new terrain: Jewish law.

So once a week they meet with Rabbi Aron L. Raskin of Chabad of Brooklyn Heights for a kosher lunch, and study session. The "Lunch and Learn" program that covers issues in the Talmud and halacha, is geared to the intellectual Jew, yet is designed to appeal to those without any background in Jewish law.

In addition to the Judges' program, Chabad of Brooklyn Heights sponsors a weekly Lawyer's "Lunch and Learn," "Torah for Assistant District Attorneys," and a "Keys to the Kabbalah" study program. Rabbi Raskin also hosts a weekly radio program called "Spirit of the Law," heard throughout the New York Metropolitain area.

"THEY FINALLY HAVE A RABBI"



SLOVAKIA

IF IT'S THE SYNAGOGUES, YESHIVAS, kosher bakeries and grocery shops that make life viable for a Jewish community, the lack thereof is sad testimony to the contrary. In Bratislava, Slovakia, until very recently, the most visible Jewish presence could be found not in life, but, rather, in death; on the weather-beaten stone markers, hundreds of years old, where one's fingers can still trace the names of great Torah luminaries and pious, sainted women. The names bear evidence of what once was, and too, of what might have been before the weeds grew wild and the markers began to fall.

With a heavy concentration of Slovakia's 3000 Jews, Bratislava is becoming decidedly more hospitable to Jewish life since the arrival, in April '93, of Rabbi Boruch and Chana Myers and their three children, now four. In June of 1993 the community held a ceremony in which Rabbi Myers was inaugurated as the official Rabbi of Bratislava and western Slovakia. The inauguration was held in the one remaining synagogue in Bratislava and was attended by several hundred people. Rabbi Myers is the first Rabbi of Bratislava since 1968.

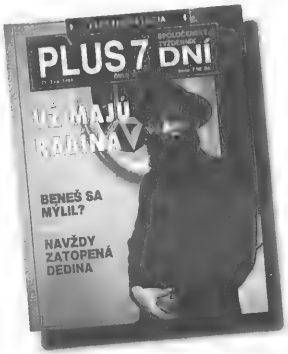
Among his first objectives was the re-vitalization of Shabbat services which are now attended by about 25 people. "One of my biggest challenges," says Rabbi Myers, 30, "is getting young people to come to shul." Many of them still operate under the threat of communism, he explains, and part of his task is shaking those fears off.

The holiday awareness programs for which Chabad is famous, have greatly relieved these fears. Last Chanukah, 300 people turned out to see the public Menorah lighting ceremony, the first publicly-held Jewish religious program in over 40 years. Attended by the President of Slovakia, the Mayor of Bratislava and the Israeli Ambassador, the experience was a turning point of sorts for many of Slovakia's Jews, where the pomp and publicity of this Jewish celebration "made them feel that they can breathe more freely," said Rabbi Myers.

Responding to the dearth of Jewish literature, the Myers' have produced sophisticated, Slovak-language Jewish holiday brochures, filled with useful information. "The people who are still ambivalent about coming out in the open, enjoy the opportunity to learn about Judaism in their homes," says Mrs. Myers, 25, who conducts classes for women and directs the Gan Irsael summer Day Camp.

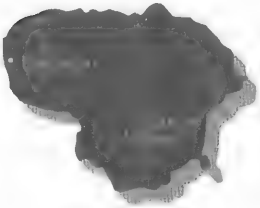
In response to the demand for more literature pouring in from other parts of Slovakia, a bilingual Siddur has been published, making traditional prayers accessible to Slovak speaking Jews. The President of the Union of Slovakian Jewish Communities, Dr. Fero Alexander, commented: "What we have been missing here for 40 years is Jewish literature. It is this gap that Rabbi Myers is beginning to fill."

In between these activities, Rabbi Myers switches caps from rabbi to schochet, so that kosher meat and poultry is now available in Bratislava. In addition, he is working with food manufacturing plants to have them produce kosher food. Of course, a viable Jewish community needs a mikvah, so that too, is now under construction. As Bratislava is slowly beginning to come alive, so too have the prospects for preserving its more than 400 Jewish cemeteries, one of which has been targeted by the city to be made into a public park. Rabbi Myers is heavily involved in negotiations with city and state officials to prevent this from happening.



Largest news magazine of Slovakia announcing: "Uz Maju Rabina- they finally have a rabbi."

While he prefers to spend all his time bringing yiddishkeit to life, Rabbi Myers says that "It is a mitzvah and an obligation to preserve and restore Jewish sacred places in Slovakia." After all, where there is Jewish life, there is sanctity in the memory of its forbears.



LITHUANIA

Chasidic Warmth in Vilna

There is a nostalgic quality about the quaint cobblestone streets of Vilna, and the decaying buildings and old houses that Jewish tourists stop to examine. Once known as the Jerusalem of Lithuania, Vilna, or Vilnius, was a stronghold of Torah scholars and Talmudic academies.

It was just about fifty years ago when 70,000 Jews were killed in Panerai, outside of Vilna, and 30,000 others were killed in the Vilna Ghetto. Lithuania, one of the Baltic States, now an independent country, is yet another place where Jewish life was put to an abrupt and cruel end, and the Jewish blood soaked up by its soil has yet to be redeemed.

So it was particularly poignant when one thousand Jewish people, many of them young, with little children, participated at a communal Passover Seder last April. Sponsored and conducted by the new Chabad-Lubavitch representatives to Vilnius, the three seders were a first for the postwar generation, and a memory recalled to life for those whose last Passover seder was more than fifty years ago.

Two years ago, Rabbi Shalom Ber Krinsky, 26, the only rabbi in Lithuania and soon to be Rabbi of the Choral Synagogue, visited Vilnius, which has some 6000 Jews. He found a real dearth of Jewish activity, but a strong interest and a growing, young Jewish population. "There are many young families with children here," says Rabbi Krinsky, "and they have had absolutely no exposure to anything Jewish."

One of his first projects, a Purim celebration, drew a crowd of 600 Jews. For the Passover seders, Rabbi Krinsky had to give out tickets. "Space was limited, and we had to turn people away at the doors," he says. The separate seders—one for families with children, one for students and one for the elderly, were conducted respectively by Rabbi Krinsky and Lubavitch Rabbinical students from New York.

Since Rabbi Krinsky and his wife, Nechama Dina, moved to Vilnius, things have been happening quickly. Rabbi Krinsky serves as a schochet, making kosher meat available to Lithuanian Jews for the first time in decades. The mikvah is being rebuilt, attendance at the shul is growing but more importantly, says Rabbi Krinsky, "we're teaching people how to daven with a minyan, and the meaning of their prayers." The Jewish State School with 150 children, is enriching its Jewish curriculum. Mrs. Krinsky, who is from New York and has taught Russian Jews before, plans to offer classes for women, and is involved with her husband in activities for Jewish college students at the Vilnius University. The Gan Israel summer camp was a first Jewish living experience for 200 children this past summer.

And for Chanukah — 3,000 people including the Mayor of Vilnius, braved the cold weather and attended a grand menorah lighting on the steps of City Hall.

Rabbi Krinsky, a native of Boston, Ma. was ordained by the Central Lubavitch Yeshiva in New York. Nechama Dina, (nee Schochet) is a graduate of the Beth Rivkah Schools in New York. The couple has a baby boy.

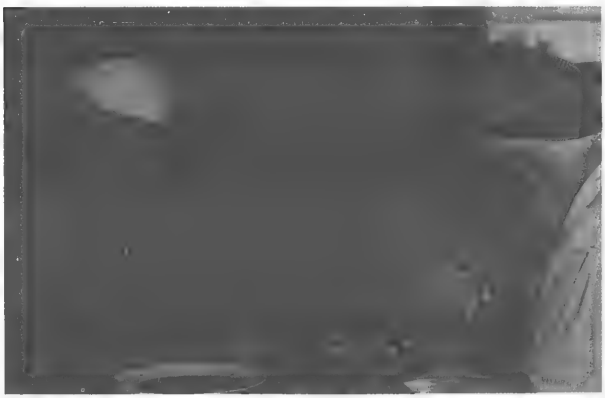
In Brazil, where there is virtually no middle class and the poor are very poor, there are some 200-300 Jewish families in S. Paulo who can be counted among Brazil's impoverished citizens.

"Many of these people," says Rabbi Dovid Weitman, "do not know where their children's next meal will come from." With no government aid or social welfare programs, these people have had no recourse, and until recently, some of S. Paulo's Jews were forced to go hungry. Today, however, they are able to enjoy a hot, three course dinner every day at noon at the Eishel Menachem soup kitchen.

"When some friends of Lubavitch wanted to present the Rebbe with a birthday gift for his 90th birthday, two years ago," explains Rabbi Weitman, "we tried to come up with something that was really needed here in the S. Paulo Jewish community." They couldn't have thought of a more appropriate cause, first of its kind in S. Paulo, and one which Rabbi Weitman acknowledges was long overdue.



A project of Ten Yad, the social service arm of Beit Chabad of Morumbi, in S. Paulo, the soup kitchen opened its doors in a one-floor rental of a large factory building in the heart of the old Jewish neighborhood of Bom Retiro, in north S. Paulo. It served 35 meals on its first day, but that number grew very quickly, and today, the soup kitchen serves 120 meals—two shifts each day, to accommodate the large number of people it feeds. "When we found that some people travel two hours each day to get a hot meal," says Rabbi Weitman, "we realized what a tremendous need the soup kitchen has filled. In the last year alone, the soup kitchen served 32,400 meals.

But the soup kitchen is not only a place where hunger pangs are subdued. It is also a place that seeks to fill a variety of needs, not least of which is loans, clothing for the poor, and needy brides. "Before Rosh Hashana," says Rabbi Weitman, "the soup kitchen provided new shoes to all the people and children it serves. We try to make it possible for the people to feel taken care of especially when a holiday comes around."

Holidays are indeed big events at the soup kitchen, where festive meals and a festive atmosphere put everyone in the holiday spirit. More importantly, the administrators and volunteers at the soup kitchen are very careful not to compromise the dignity of the people it serves. "We are very careful to preserve the respect and pride of the people who come here," says one of the 32 volunteers, "and we feel they should be received as guests."

The soup kitchen offers food for the soul as well. Every meal begins with a Torah comment, and Mr. Shimon Neistein, an extremely dedicated volunteer, goes from table to table helping everyone with the proper blessings on the food. In addition, a social worker, Mrs. Terezinha Davidovitch, is on staff offering counseling and guidance to people in distress.

Assuring a smoothly run operation are several volunteers who willingly give of their time, day after day. Coordinated by Mrs. Ruth Blank and administrated by Mrs. Ariane Stern, the soup kitchen has been so successful that it has now expanded to include a second floor which was renovated and outfitted with a large, fully equipped Kosher kitchen. At the inauguration ceremony for the expanded facility, more than 500 people—among them distinguished deputies and senators, turned out to tour the newly renovated facility. At the ceremony, the soup kitchen, formerly known by the name Eishel Mamash, was renamed Eishel Menachem in the Rebbe's memory.

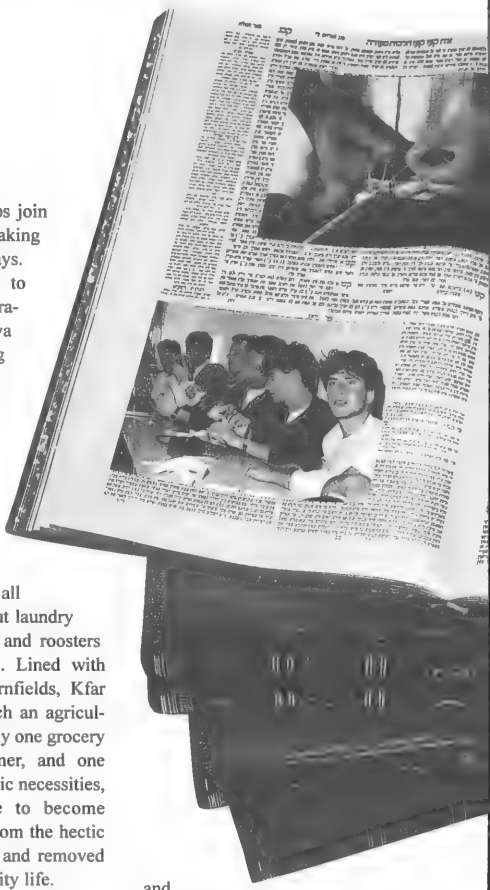
Immediately after the inauguration, Eishel Menachem began its "Meals on Wheels" program for the immobile and homebound. The "Meals on Wheels" service now delivers close to 40 meals a day, and the number keeps growing.

"This project is something that I think the entire Jewish community is tremendously proud of," says Mrs. Davidovitch, who is also executive coordinator of the Ten Yad institution. "Because of its humanitarian, social and spiritual value, it is embraced by everyone in the community, and I'm hoping that it will set an example for other communities with similar needs." Indeed, when Victor Sapienza, President of the Assembly of the Deputies of S. Paulo, returned to his old neighborhood to visit the soup kitchen he met a childhood friend, a fellow soccer player, eating at the soup kitchen.

This really hit home with him and he now sends a basket of food every month, without fail, to the soup kitchen. "If all communities would adopt such a program," said the Mayor at the inauguration, "then we would save the people of Brazil from this misery."

COMING HOME



SOMEWHERE ALONG THE WAY, after his Bar Mitzvah, Yehuda Kaye, 19, from South Africa, began to drift from the Jewish lifestyle he was raised with in his parents' home. He drifted far, until, as he puts it, "I pretty much dropped everything."

Today, however, Yehuda spends most of his day splitting hairs over Talmudic minutiae, or exploring the relationship between abstract concepts of Chasidic philosophy and their applications in a pragmatic context. "The Chasidut is simply marvelous," he says of the classes taught by the widely renowned Rabbi Gafni, "particularly for someone like myself, who's experienced disillusionment."

It was Rabbi Yosef Kessleman, a Chabad Rabbi in South Africa, who knew Yehuda's potential and wouldn't let go. He convinced Yehuda to try Ohr Tmimim, an English-language yeshiva in Israel. During his last six months at Ohr Tmimim, Yehuda seems to have found for himself a pace and level that suit him comfortably. Although Ohr Tmimim has a one and a half year Smicha (Ordination) program—and has given rabbinic ordination to more than 30 young men—Yehuda doesn't plan to seek ordination. Instead he wants to stay on at least until December, and then perhaps, return to South Africa to study psychology. On second thought, "I may decide to stay on for another year, and perhaps join the larger Hebrew speaking Tomchei program," he says.

Yehuda is referring to Tomchei Tmimim, the traditional Lubavitch Yeshiva in Kfar Chabad and big brother yeshiva to its adjunct, Ohr Tmimim. Kfar Chabad, a tranquil, country village south of Tel Aviv is a place where the modern and the old-fashioned are in perfect balance. Its schools and homes have all the modern amenities, but laundry is still hung out to dry, and roosters herald the morning sun. Lined with orange orchards and cornfields, Kfar Chabad is still very much an agricultural village, and with only one grocery store, one chicken farmer, and one fruitier to provide the basic necessities, it is the perfect place to become engrossed in study, far from the hectic pace of life in Tel-Aviv, and removed from the distractions of city life.

For Asher Belis, 20, a nutrition major at Cornell University, and now a student at Ohr Tmimim, Kfar Chabad as a setting for the yeshiva has special appeal. "This is a place, as opposed to all other yeshivas, where there are no distractions, and I can really sit down and learn." Belis, whose only exposure to Judaism was his visit to a Conservative synagogue when he attended his father's second wedding, learned of Ohr Tmimim through the Chabad Rabbi on his campus at Cornell. "The classes are offered on a variety of levels so that every student can fit into the program," he says. More importantly, "the Rabbis have a way of bringing the concepts down to my level so that I come away from every class feeling that I've actually learned something about why I am in this world." Being able to study with Rabbi Gafni he continues, "is a true privilege for me."

Yehuda and Asher are among Ohr Tmimim's 40 students who spend roughly 12 hours a day studying, alternating for the most part between Talmud and Chasidut, developing the textual skills and conceptual understanding necessary for independent study. All of Ohr Tmimim's students are English speaking, and each comes to the yeshiva with a unique background. An offshoot of Tomchei Tmimim, Ohr Tmimim was established following the '67 war. "There was an incredible surge in Jewish interest among American and other English speaking students in Israel after the Six-Day War," says Rabbi Tuvia Bolton, Assistant Dean. Many of these students arrived in Kfar Chabad, seeking direction to channel their thirst for Judaism. It was then that the Rebbe gave instructions to develop an English-language study program as part of Tomchei Tmimim. With Rabbi Schneur Zalman Gafni at its head, the Ohr Tmimim program was established.

The Rebbe's foresight proved itself as the success of Ohr Tmimim grew, particularly because of its unique affiliation with Tomchei Tmimim. Distinct from the latter in that its study program is in English and is designed to meet the student at his, often times beginners level, Ohr Tmimim is otherwise part of the Tomchei yeshiva. "What that means," explains Rabbi Bolton, "is that the Ohr Tmimim students interact with the Tomchei students throughout the day." Students share the same dormitory facilities and take meals together, and when they have advanced far enough, often graduate to the Tomchei program.

Until recently, word of the Ohr Tmimim program got around by word of mouth alone and in fact, only recently was given the name "Ohr Tmimim," to identify it as a unique program. "We have just begun to spread the word through formal channels, and I think the yeshiva will see a lot of growth in the near future," says Rabbi Bolton, who in addition to teaching at Ohr Tmimim, manages the yeshiva's student body and Outreach Programs.

Tuvia Simon, 20, from Oxfordshire, England, is another Ohr Tmimim student. Tuvia expects to spend two or three years at the yeshiva and receive his rabbinic ordination while studying for a vocation as a scribe.

"The Rabbis here are totally dedicated to us, and their breadth of knowledge and willingness to become involved in our personal lives and growth have made me exceptionally happy here." In addition, says Tuvia, "the interaction with the students of Tomchei is a big inspiration."

GETTING SERIOUS IN AFTERNOON SCHOOL

"BEGINNING WITH THE NEXT SCHOOL YEAR," SAYS RABBI GITLIN, "THE TALMUD TORAH CAN EXPECT TO ENROLL ANOTHER 100 STUDENTS BETWEEN THE TWO SCHOOLS."

THERE AREN'T TOO MANY KIDS who will jump at the suggestion that they go to a Talmud Torah after school hours. Many who do go, feel they're doing their parents a great favor. Even adults, who retrospectively appreciate the experience, confess that as kids, having to go to Talmud Torah when the other kids on the block were out playing ball, was a real drag.

Students at the Chabad-Lubavitch of Markham Talmud Torah are singing to a different tune. "They simply love it here," one parent said of her two children who attend the school three times a week for two hours, as a supplement to their public school education.

Rabbi Meir Gitlin, principal of the school, is not surprised. The object of Rabbi Gitlin's passion, the school distinguishes itself from other afternoon school programs with its unique curriculum created by Rabbi Gitlin to meet the particular needs of its students. "I feel that each subject offered by the school deserves a thorough, comprehensive treatment so that the children gain a deep understanding and appreciation of whatever it is they are learning." Rabbi Gitlin, whose hands-on approach has inspired him to develop a resource center for his teachers to facilitate an exciting program, is involved in the progress of every class. Exhibits, tours, video presentations and competitive activities are often included in the curriculum, covering the gamut from Hebrew reading, writing and conversational language, to Bible, Jewish history, the Jewish life cycle and Jewish music.

"The Talmud Torah is not an afterthought," says Rabbi Gitlin who is consulted by Talmud Torahs in Canada and the U.S. "Parents and students take it very seriously—and their consistent attendance—unusual for most Talmud Torahs, is evidence of that." Indeed, the seriousness and professionalism with which it is run has allowed the school to flourish from a small Talmud Torah into a widely respected community school.

After joining Rabbi Avraham E. Plotkin, Director of Chabad-Lubavitch of Markham, in 1989, and with the help of Mr. Chai Cohen, Rabbi Gitlin immediately set out to establish a Talmud Torah in the community. Under the direction of Rabbi Gitlin the school has grown to 350 students (175 students in the Markham school, and 175 in a newly opened division in Vaughn serving the Bathurst Jewish community) with a kindergarten through eighth grade program. "Beginning with the next school year," says Rabbi Gitlin, "the Talmud Torah can expect to enroll another 100 students between the two schools."

Congress Awards Rebbe Gold Medal

Before the close of the 103rd Congress, both Houses passed legislation by unanimous consent to award a Congressional Gold Medal to the Rebbe. The award honors the Rebbe for his "outstanding and lasting contributions toward improvements in world education, morality and acts of charity."

The bill, which was introduced in the House of Representatives by Charles Schumer (D-NY), John Lewis (D-GA), Newt Gingrich, and Jerry Lewis (R-CA), attracted a wide coalition of over 225 co-sponsors crossing all political, racial and ethnic lines. Senator Alfonse D'Amato introduced the legislation in the Senate.

This type of award is highly selective and dates back to the early history of the U.S. when George Washington was tendered a gold medal on behalf of Congress and the Thirteen Colonies for his "wise and spirited conduct" in the siege and acquisition of Boston. In the history of Congress fewer than one hundred legislative actions have bestowed this honor. The bill calls on the Treasury Department to design and strike the medal. 10,000 replicas will be minted in bronze for sale to the public in the spring.

"This award reflects the appreciation of the American people for the Rebbe and his contributions to the educational and moral fabric of our society," said Rabbi Avraham Shemtov, National Director of American Friends of Lubavitch in Washington D.C.

Palestinian Authority makes promise

Will take steps against terror

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Israel has reportedly obtained a Palestinian commitment to take specific steps against terror before implementing the next phase of the autonomy plan.

According to separate communiques issued by the two sides at the conclusion of Sunday's foreign ministers' meeting here, the Palestinians are responsible for "pre-empting terror, prosecuting those responsible, and denying those who plan and carry out terror or violence any safe haven."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told Israeli reporters Sunday night that Israel had not promised it would lift the closure of the territories in exchange for the Palestinians taking those steps.

In fact, Israel's cabinet on Sunday voted to extend the three-week-old closure. According to a recent poll, the continuing closure is supported by 80 per cent of the Israeli public.

Peres said the Israeli position toward the Palestinian Authority (PA) is, "Take care of terror and we'll take care of everything we promised. We'll judge according to the actions, not declarations. We said the expectation of these things are those that will determine the lifting of the closure."

The communiques followed seven hours of meetings between the foreign ministers of Israel, Egypt, Jordan, the United States and PA planning minister Nabil Sh'ath.

U.S. President Bill Clinton used the summit to throw his political weight behind the floundering Middle East peace process, urging officials to push ahead with their efforts.

Joined by Vice-President Al Gore, Clinton urged Israel and its peace partners not to "let people believe that they can disrupt the rational, humane, decent course of history by terror."

The one-day summit concluded with a joint communique pledging "strong commitment to honoring those agreements already concluded" and "to accelerate negotiations on all tracks."

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher and national security adviser Anthony Lake also attended the sessions, as did Russian deputy foreign minister Viktor Posuvalyuk, about 50 Israeli and Arab diplomats, and several other American officials.

The summit was the latest in a series of high-level meetings among regional leaders in recent weeks to jump-start the stalled talks, particularly on the Israeli Palestinian front.

The talks came at a particularly fragile point in the peace process.

On the Israeli-Palestinian track, negotiations have stalled in the wake of terrorist attacks against Israelis.

Manning calls for prosecution of war criminals

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In an effort to build good relations with the Jewish community and generate support for Reform Party byelection candidates, party leader Preston Manning sat down behind closed doors last week with community representatives.

Last Thursday's session came near the end of a five-day Montreal trip by Manning meant to boost Reform Party candidates running for the first time in Quebec. The Feb. 13 byelections were expected to be a bellwether of support for Quebec sovereignty.

As Reform begins organizing in Quebec, Manning told The CJN in an exclusive interview last Friday, it will address concerns that local associations may attract extremists, as happened in the West and in Ontario.

"We are going to be very careful not to let special interest groups take a run at the party. Eventually we find them and throw them out, but they do a lot of damage. They've got to be nipped in the bud," Manning said.

Reform hopes to run a candidate in every Quebec riding in the next federal election.

In a 25-minute interview at the Reform Party office on Rene Levesque Boulevard, Manning discussed his party's views on war criminals, multiculturalism and the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service.

He said Nazi war criminals should continue to be prosecuted in Canada but not deported, as proposed by the Liberal government. "There's no way any country can compensate for the horrific things that happened to the Jewish people, but this [prosecutions] is one way we can say 'never, never again,'" he said.

Exclusive to The CJN

Manning said there should be no time limit on prosecutions.

He said the "biggest tribute" Canada can pay to the memory of Jewish victims is to be "vigilant" against the perpetrators of more recent atrocities who may seek refuge here, he said. "Some think they can find safe haven here, and that's an insult to the memory of those killed during the war."

Manning is eager to set the Jewish community's mind at rest about his party's policies and his personal outlook. Last week's meeting was his first in this province. He also met privately with Jewish students at McGill Hillel.

Manning said his father Ernest, a founder of the Social Credit party in Alberta, faced the same challenge of fighting anti-Semitism within its ranks.

Those who blamed Jewish financiers for causing the Depression did infiltrate the Socreds, but Manning is proud his father "rooted them out and even fired some who were quite high up."

Fringe groups infiltrating the party are not Manning's only headache. He is still seeking a satisfactory answer on what Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS) informant Grant Bristow was doing inside Reform.

He suspects the former Conservative government deliberately attempted to discredit Reform by using a "government paid agent to create the impression of a link between Reform and the Heritage Front for political purposes."

Teens Sentenced

WINNIPEG — Two rural Manitoba teenagers charged with spraying anti-Semitic graffiti on a synagogue on Halloween were sentenced recently to nine months probation, 75 hours of community work and attendance at a Holocaust awareness seminar.

One of the youths wrote an open letter of apology to the Jewish community that was published in the local Jewish weekly.

The teens were charged with desecrating the 40-year-old Winnipeg Beach Shul, which is used in the summer by families vacationing on the shores of Lake Winnipeg, about 70 km north of the city.

Arrests Follow Brawl

TORONTO — Two people have been charged in connection with a bloody brawl between skinheads and anti-racists at a Toronto subway station.

Adrian Kaddie is charged with attempted murder after an anti-racist activist had his throat slit.

Another man faces a variety of charges.

Two other anti-racists were stabbed in the melee.

The anti-racists have been linked to the militant group Anti-Racist Action.

Wurzweiler Rep Here

NEW YORK — A representative of Yeshiva University's renowned Wurzweiler School of Social Work here will be in Ottawa and Toronto this month and next to meet with students interested in the school's summer programs.

Anita Rotman, professor emeritus of Social Work at Wurzweiler, will be at Ottawa's Chateau Laurier Hotel on Feb. 26 and 27, and at Toronto's Park Plaza Hotel Feb. 28-March 3, and again March 8-10.

Those interested in arranging interviews, call the Chateau Laurier at 613-241-1414 or the Park Plaza at 416-924-5471.

ISRAEL

Dinitz Testifies

JERUSALEM — Former Jewish Agency chairman Simcha Dinitz last week began giving evidence in his own defence on charges he used agency credit cards for personal purposes.

Appearing in court as the first witness for the defence, Dinitz argued he was not required to report expenses, based on the status he had been granted by the Jewish Agency board of governors.

He explained that in practice, he had been given a status technically similar to that of the prime minister and that he acted like one when it came to matters of expenses while on agency business.

Edri Acquittal Appealed

JERUSALEM — Israel's Judge Advocate-General last week appealed the recent decision by a military court to acquit Lt. Oren Edri.

Edri was acquitted earlier this month on charges he trained right-wing activists in weapons, knowing they were organizing a Jewish underground.

He was convicted of taking Israel Defence Force explosives without authorization, but the conviction was termed "technical," and Edri was freed.

Last week, the prosecutor asked the military court of appeals to convict Edri on several charges, including divulging classified military information to civilians, and requested a jail term.

New Ten Shekel Coin

JERUSALEM — The Bank of Israel has announced it is issuing a new 10-shekel coin, which will gradually replace the bill of the same denomination.

The coin is a reproduction of an ancient Hebrew coin from 69 CE, one year before the destruction of the Second Temple and the fourth year of the war between the Romans and the Jews.

The new coin will lower production costs, as it will outlast the bill, a mint department official said.

Hesder Founder Dies

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Haim Ya'akov Goldvicht, dean of Yeshivat Kerem Beyavne for 40 years and founder of the hesder yeshivah program, died in Jerusalem last Tuesday. He was 69.

In 1954, Rabbi Goldvicht established Yeshivat Kerem Beyavne at Kibbutz Yavne, and served as its head until his death.

He also conceived and implemented the hesder yeshivah movement, in which students integrate Torah study with service in the Israel Defence Force.

There are 15 hesder yeshivot today, with another five scheduled to open next year.

Swiss Asked for Apology

GENEVA — A Socialist member of the Swiss Federal Assembly has proposed that the government apologize for introducing in 1938 a rubber stamp bearing the letter "J" that was applied to the passports of all Jewish citizens.

Newt, Bibi Talk

WASHINGTON — Israel's deteriorating security situation will affect the U.S. Congress's readiness to authorize American troops on the Golan Heights, House Speaker Newt Gingrich told Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu here last week.

Following their meeting, Netanyahu said American willingness to deploy troops on the Golan has been weakened.

However, Gingrich "did not say whether he is for or against" stationing U.S. troops on the Golan, and "I didn't ask him to say so," Netanyahu added.

The Likud leader said he has found Congress more open to what his party has to say about the Oslo accords than during his previous visits.

Nazi Dismissal Rapped

BONN — Jewish and government leaders have criticized a recent decision by a German court to dismiss a case against two neo-Nazis who used a telephone hotline to spread Holocaust-denial propaganda.

The messages said that the murder of Jews during World War II was "an Auschwitz myth."

The court ruled the use of that term did not amount to Holocaust-denial, a punishable offense in Germany.

The prosecution said it will appeal the ruling.

Genetic research centre launched

Mount Sinai facility will aid in diagnosis and treatment

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto has taken a giant leap into the forefront of medical research with the recent establishment of the Centre for Human Genome Research and Molecular Medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital.

The centre, which is expected to open in 1996, will be part of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

The $15.3 million in funding came from Bristol-Myers Squibb Pharmaceutical Research Institute and the Canada/Ontario Infrastructure Works program.

Research will focus on understanding the genetic factors and molecular bases responsible for human development.

Dr. Alan Bernstein, director of the Lunenfeld Institute, told The CJN the centre will aid in the diagnosis and treatment of human diseases, such as breast and prostate cancer, heart disease, diabetes, birth defects and neurodegenerative diseases.

One hundred fifty scientists, technicians and research trainees will be employed in the 15,000-sq. ft. facility on the hospital's 10th floor.

The work of the centre, Bernstein said, will complement other genetic research being carried out at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, at McGill University in Montreal, and at the University of British Columbia, where a centre for molecular medicine is soon to be built.

Scientists now know that a person's genetic makeup may predispose them to or protect them from developing certain diseases.

For example, the gene BRCA 1 has been shown to make women more susceptible to breast or ovarian cancer.

"Just one gene has opened up a whole area [of treatment and research]," Bernstein said.

"It will be possible to do a DNA test on a woman to find if the BRCA 1 gene is good or bad, and so increase her chances with monitoring and early treatment."

Researchers at the centre hope to find ways to alter genes, to design better drugs and to better understand the nature and purpose of each of the genes.

Another research goal, Bernstein said, will be to learn the relative importance of genetic makeup versus environmental factors in contracting diseases.

The centre will be part of the Human Genome Project, a worldwide cooperative effort to identify each of the 50,000 to 100,000 genes in the human body.

Bristol-Myers Squibb has been supporting the work of the Lunenfeld Institute for five years, at an annual rate of $1 million.

They have raised their contribution to $2 million per year for the next five years, in connection with the new centre.

Most of their contribution will be used to create animal models in which genes can be studied.

"Once a gene is isolated," Bernstein said, it will be possible to make a copy of it, and then study how it works in an animal. Eventually, we will study the epidemiology in people.

"What makes the Lunenfeld institute so unique, is that because we have both the scientists and the hospital setting, we can cover the whole spectrum of research."

Bristol-Myers Squibb will have the first rights to bid on any therapies or animal models developed by the centre.

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Recent Palestinian terrorist acts against Israelis may lead to civil strife inside Israel between rightists and supporters of the present government, a leading activist has warned.

Shifra Hoffman, founder of the Jerusalem-based Victims of Arab Terror (VAT), said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his Labor-led coalition have so polarized Israeli society that "the right and the left are mobilized. I pray and hope it doesn't happen, but the terrible escalation [in terror attacks] may lead to counter-action."

The fiery Hoffman, in town for a series of speaking engagements at various Orthodox venues, mocked the Oslo peace accord, which led to the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO, as a "piece-by-piece" treaty that is slowly carving up the Jewish state.

Rabin, she said, "is ready to make Israel the size of a postage stamp" in exchange for peace.

Hoffman told The CJN she has been to more funerals and memorials since the accord was signed in 1993 than ever before.

Shifra Hoffman

About 125 Israelis have been killed in Arab terror attacks since the pact was sealed on the White House lawn, she noted.

An unabashed supporter of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane and his now-banned far-right policies, Hoffman said it was a "chillul Hashem (desecration of G-d's name)" to award last year's Nobel Peace Prize to "a murderer" like PLO leader Yasser Arafat, and for Rabin to accept it.

"Any decent person feels outrage," she said.

She claimed that a majority of Israelis now oppose implentation of the Palestinian autonomy accords. That would contradict the findings of a recent poll, which found 41 per cent of respondents said Israel should proceed with implementation, 27 per cent said it should not and 32 per cent have adopted a wait-and-see approach.

Hoffman said she "envies Arab pride. When one of them is killed, stores are closed and there are strikes." But she finds it "absolutely disgusting" that Israeli Jews do not respond the same way when their compatriots are murdered by Palestinians.

Neither did Hoffman have kind words for Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who "speaks in platitudes."

Hoffman came to Toronto from San Francisco, where she was arrested during a speech by Israel's ambassador to the United States, Itamar Rabinovitch. She was charged with battery and disturbing the peace, but claims she was "roughed up" and denied a chance to speak.

In 1986, the U.S.-born Hoffman established VAT, whose volunteers visit families of those killed in terrorist incidents and advocate on behalf of survivors and surviving relatives.

Providing the right answers seen essential for continuity

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Unless we tell children why to be Jewish as well as how to be Jewish, we can't expect them to stay Jewish, according to the chief executive of Jewish Continuity in Britain.

"If we haven't got answers to that," Clive Lawton said, "then we are in a seriously disabled position when it comes to talking to young people."

Lawton was in Ottawa recently to talk to parents and students about the challenge of Jewish continuity. The relaxed, denim-shirted Lawton said too often, the answer to the question "Why be Jewish?" is tied to the past. Stay Jewish for the sake of your grandparents, we tell children. Or because you are part of 5,000-year-old chain of tradition. Unfortunately, Lawton said, history does not influence children's future choices.

"If we don't get a way of talking to young Jews about how being Jewish is a necessary part of their future, then any number of appeals to the past is not going to do," Lawton said.

One of the strongest messages children get from us is that Judaism is for kids. Parents in the audience chuckled with recognition as Lawton compared the atmosphere of a Simchat Torah service with a birthday party.

Typically, adults shove flags into the hands of their children and then watch with amusement from the sidelines as they march around the sanctuary behind the Torah. Small children have a grand time, but by the time they are 10 years old, Lawton said, what they are thinking is this: "You just wait until I'm 12 and I can stop this."

Key is to show children how it will enrich the lives of their offspring

"These [Jewish celebrations] are supposed to be of cosmic significance and we use them as playtime to keep 4-year-olds happy," Lawton said.

Similarly, children see that Jewish education is something imposed on the powerless by adults. For instance, Lawton asked, how many adults in Ottawa studied Judaism with the same intensity and workload as their children? For most adults, Jewish education consists of taking in the occasioned lecture. The message children get is that ending Jewish study is a sign of adulthood.

Lawton's advice is that parents show children how Judaism is passed on from parent to child, so that they will know how to do it when they are parents themselves. And that involves observing at least some Jewish rituals.

"I think most Jewish parents have a gut feeling that they would like their children to find something of value in being Jewish," he said. "But then they actually have to have a strategy. They can't be satisfied with just a gut feeling."

Lawton said he appreciates that many parents will feel skeptical and uneasy observing rituals, like lighting Shabbat candles, for the first time. But he says they have nothing to lose.

"What they have to know is that it's not harmful and if they suspect that it may be beneficial at some level they don't understand, then it's worth trying. If they do that I think they'll start finding things of value ... I can't guarantee that every single Jew will be turned on by being Jewish, but I can guarantee they won't be harmed by it," Lawton says.

Vancouver JCC expands as membership grows

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Membership in the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver grew by 15 per cent last year, with thousands more taking part in the centre's programs.

Executive director Gerry Zipursky, speaking at the centre's recent annual meeting, reported that membership is up to 3,000, and another 7,000 to 8,000 non-members are using its services.

Add to that the almost completed $11-million expansion, which will double the current space to 100,000 square feet, and the centre becomes "a vibrant community cultural activity" in Vancouver, said president Gary Averbach.

Construction at the Oak Street and West 41st Avenue building includes the addition of the 500-seat Norman Rothstein Theatre, the Isaac Waldman Library, a large Holocaust Education Centre, as well as complete renovation and enlargement of community organization offices such as Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, Hadassah-WIZO, Jewish National Fund Pacific region, Jewish Federation and Jewish Family Services.

The final phase of construction will begin in May to accommodate the Jack Belzberg memorial pool, a woman's health club, an adult lounge and centres for preteens, teens, seniors and day care.

The finished centre will be the largest non-profit community centre in the Lower Mainland. Provincial grants have helped to raise $7.5 million towards its cost.

"Building a community and realizing a dream doesn't come easily," Zipursky told the annual general meeting.

Skinheads, hatemongers fail to stop author's message

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — White power skinheads have stalked and harassed the author of a book probing racism and hate crimes in Canada.

Warren Kinsella, author of Web of Hate, said he has installed surveillance cameras outside his Ottawa home to protect his family. When he and his wife register in hotels they use assumed names. He said he frequently changes his unlisted phone number.

Just before his speech to a United Jewish Appeal meeting here, Kinsella found his mail box stuffed with child pornography.

At the meeting in the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York, the author said he was sure a representative of the harassing groups was in the audience of 150, taking notes.

"You won't scare us out of our home," he said. " You won't make us leave town."

Young people are the target of today's racists, said Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress at the meeting sponsored by UJA's Young Professionals Network.

Hatemongers feed on the insecurity of young people in today's economy, Farber said. "Though there was a time when black and Jewish communities walked as one, in some circles the Jew is a scapegoat for the ills of black America. Young, black, educated Americans are being manipulated and sucked into this rhetoric."

CJC's Bernie Farber (centre) is flanked by fellow guest speaker Warren Kinsella and moderator Jane Hawtin of CFRB.

However, the CJC official said, the black and Jewish communities must maintain dialogue and continue to build bridges.

Neo-Nazi and white power groups are "better organized, more articulate and more numerous than even a decade ago," Kinsella said, adding that Canadians are mistaken in believing the far right is just a "few old rednecks with few organizational skills."

He said Canada's racist groups are waiting and watching and growing stronger. "'Never underestimate the ability of Canada's neo-Nazis and hate group leaders," he warned. "They have seduced hundreds of adolescents into their ideology. School yards from primary to secondary are the first battleground, and the Heritage Front has elevated recruitment of young people into an art form. "

Shendy's Swim School

Eric Shendelman has been in the field of aquatics for 12 years. He has also done extensive work in camping, with 15 years' experience including positions as a program director and section head. Water safety, he insists, is vital; so, as he puts it, he "brings aquatics to camp". A well-trained staff in this field, he says, makes his school successful.

Shendy's instructors are in a three-to-one ratio to students. Shendelman says there are two keys to the child's learning success: personal attention to the student; and treating the parents as partners. Therefore, his instructors are always approachable, both to parents and children.

There are courses both in fitness and competitive swimming, though the emphasis is on fitness and water safety. Also, there are swimming programs for adults.

Instructors are experienced, with Red Cross and Royal Lifesaving certificates. The school offers regular staff training updates, including summer camp recertification courses for all camp staff, and also trains instructors for other camps and schools. Advanced leadership courses include Red Cross and Royal Lifesaving. Instructors' courses, National Life Guard Award, CPR, aquatic emergency care and Bronze courses.

Shendy's Swim School is a commercial member of the Ontario Camping Association. For more information, please call Eric Shendelman at (416) 784-0900.

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There were 249 hate crimes in Metro Toronto in 1994, an increase of 61 per cent over the previous year, the head of the police hate crime unit, told the Ontario region Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) executive Feb. 9.

The highest number of offences were committed against blacks with Jewish people the second highest among victims, Det.Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave said.

However, Cotgreave asked the executive "not to be alarmed" because his unit has "better control" of the situation and police chief designate David Boothby wants closer relations with minority communities.

"We've had good relations with the police, though we did experience a bump recently," said executive chair Gerda Frieberg in introducing Cotgreave. "But even if we've had our differences we've been able to work them out and the unit's formation is a good omen."

In turn, Cotgreave, said: "I hope our good relations will continue."

Providing only a few of the details which the unit will report fully to the Police Services Board Mar. 2, Cotgreave said more than 60 per cent of hate crimes in 1994 were perpetrated by people under 25 and the highest percentage of these were under 17.

He agreed with Bernie Farber, CJC community relations director, that the tensions between anti-racism youth and neo-Nazis is a situation of serious concern, evidenced by a clash between the two groups at a Kennedy Road subway station recently.

"There is an attempt to stockpile weapons and innocent people may end up getting hurt," Farber said.

"There are hooligans on either side," said Cotgreave. "The anti-racist youth on the whole are a sincere group though unfortunately there is a small element that is quite active and has a potential for violence."

The crime unit head said a "racist rock producer" had recently moved from Toronto to Detroit "and is now putting out rock music in the United States which is horrifying to say the least."

Hate literature being distributed on Internet and other electronic bulletin boards is a real challenge for the unit, Cotgreave said, because Canadian law appears unclear. A task force is needed to investigate hate literature through networking, he said. In the meantime, a group of 20 police forces in the Golden Horseshoe area are exchanging information on how best to prosecute offences.

The unit head and fellow officers Det. Const. Dave Malcolm and Det. Steve Irwin described its workings and encouraged complainants to come forward. In particular, Cotgreave urged anyone who knows about stockpiling of weapons to inform the police "to save trouble down the road."

Malcolm applauded the existence of 19 STAR (Students Against Racism) groups in Toronto schools and mentioned a particularly active one in Downsview Secondary School. "It's amazing what they can do," Malcolm said. "When kids get together without involving adults it usuallly works out."

Frieberg suggested that all police be taken on a tour of the Holocaust Remembrance Museum in Toronto "so they can see the end result of what starts in the school yard with name calling."

Jewish pavilion threatened by lack of volunteers

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish participation in a popular multicultural festival here is being threatened by a lack of volunteers.

Folkorama, one of North America's premier multicultural festivals, may open in August without the usual Israel Pavilion-Shalom Square at the YMHA Jewish Community Centre.

The Jewish community has been part of the festival for 25 years. But the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, which funds the pavilion, says a lack of volunteers is now threatening its existence.

Council president Don Aronovitch said the pavilion usually loses money, but "the community is willing to pick up the losses [which are] reasonable considering the tremendous public relations value Shalom Square has both for our internal Jewish community and for the wider community.

"However, we can't operate without volunteers."

Over 50 cultures are represented at Folkorama.

Longtime Shalom Square performer Jerry Maslowsky said fellow volunteers have become tired. "I overheard some people last year talking about stopping," he said. "It's a very demanding job even for just one intense week."

An organizing meeting in January attracted only a handful of volunteers. Organizers have sent an open letter to the community asking for help. "Many organizations have difficulty getting people out," Aronovitch said. "Ultimately, people vote with their time."

David Cohen, a four-time Shalom Square mayor, said he is upset at the prospect of Folkorama without an Israel Pavilion.

"Shalom Square has been a great showcase for the Jewish community," he said. "It is one pavilion other people look up to. It would be a mistake if the community doesn't do something to keep it open."

Dr. Adolph Asher Appell

Surgeon broke medical barriers

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Adolph Asher Appell, a surgeon who broke medical and religious barriers in the city, died Feb. 5 of cancer. He was 89.

Appell, the son of a fur dealer from Lindsay, Ont., was one of the first Jewish doctors to intern at the Toronto General Hospital, following his graduation from the University of Toronto Medical School in 1929.

He was also one of the first Toronto doctors to surgically treat Crohn's disease and, with Dr. Vera Peters, was an early proponent of lumpectomies for breast cancer.

At a time when Jewish doctors were not granted admitting and operating room privileges in city hospitals, Appell was a rarity.

His 1929 appointment to the Toronto General Hospital came six years after Mount Sinai Hospital was founded by Jewish doctors shut out of the larger medical establishment.

Jewish doctors were unwelcome in Montreal as well. When Dr. I. Rabinovitch was accepted as an intern by Notre Dame Hospital in 1934, fellow trainees went on strike in protest.

Despite offers from the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., where he finished his training, and the Wellesley Hospital, Appell joined the surgical staff of Mount Sinai Hospital in 1934 and practised there until retiring in 1970. He continued a consulting practise until he was 87.

"He was a very, very caring and good person," said Mount Sinai surgeon Dr. Irving Koven, who trained under Appell in the '60s. "He practised medicine to the best of his knowledge and gave patients the best medical treatment that he could."

Niece Helen Hirschorn remembers her uncle as a modest man and a pioneering surgeon who saved her life in 1944 with his understanding of inflammatory bowel disease.

Hirschorn, then 17, was in a summer camp infirmary with what was thought to be a flu bug when Appell cut short a fishing trip to check in on her. Her flu turned out to be fulminating ulcerative colitis, and she was rushed to New York City for treatment. Appell performed a final operation in Toronto.

When Hirschorn once asked him why he was so popular with patients, Appell told her that "operating is a lot like being a good cook: you can give your recipe to someone else, but it never turns out the same way."

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer Fred M. Catzman has been researching their origins over the past few years. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

MAKAGON

Murray Tonken, of Mississauga's Makagon Industries Ltd., enquires about the name Makagon as a surname. It sounded like the name of a Scottish clan, but it is actually a Ukrainian word spelled Makogon. It means a pestle for pounding poppy. I wonder whether it is a pharmaceutical device.

A symbol of unity

Romeo LeBlanc's first day as governor general was auspicious. He spoke to Canadians from the heart, eloquently, poignantly relying on rich, memory-laden language to convey a powerful message of national unity.

"I believe that we still learn as much from our differences as we do from our similarities. When we only talk among ourselves, all we get back are echoes. But when we talk with others of a different mind, we are made to think. And it is in thinking that we learn and in learning that we grow."

LeBlanc is Canada's 25th governor general since Confederation, only the eighth Canadian to hold the post and the first ever Acadian to become the head of state.

The position itself of course is not without controversy. Many Canadians feel that it is now anachronistic. But the debate about the position's relevance is not one which we join at this time.

The prime minister speaks for the political majority; but the governor general represents the whole country. The position is thus entirely symbolic. One scholar has described it as "a subtle presence above divisions and differences, affirming community, an acceptance of inherited loyalties and permanent ideals."

The Jewish people understand very well that symbols, through time, like an invisible thread weaving a national fabric, can fasten a nation and bind a collective consciousness.

It is appropriate therefore as LeBlanc picks up the potentially powerfully symbol on the eve of the second "referendum", that we wish for him the hopes expressed in a traditional Jewish prayer: that he help to administer the affairs of state in justice and equity, that happiness and prosperity, right and freedom forever abide among us, and that he help to unite all the people of this country whatever their origin and creed.

Out of their experiences, human beings fashion symbols. Perhaps one day, out of our symbols, Canadians will be able to fashion the experience of a truly united nation.

A threat to many

Finding agreement with the Palestinians on the basis of the Oslo accords is difficult enough for Israel. But the intrusion of fanatic terror by Islamic fundamentalists complicates the process immeasurably.

In this week's Perspectives, Prof. David Newman of Ben-Gurion University captures dramatically the dilemma facing the government of Israel in its attempt to conclude an agreement with the Palestinians. He compares the current situation tactically to the one which the leaders of the Yishuv faced more than 50 years ago. He believes Israel must press two simultaneous campaigns: negotiations with the Palestinian leadership and war against the fundamentalists.

Newman contends that "Israel must fight, and fight hard, against the fundamentalist threat if it is ever to achieve peace."

That Israel can fight, and fight hard, has been amply demonstrated by history. That Israel may have to fight the fundamentalists alone, has also been amply demonstrated by history. This though, would be unfortunate and ironic. For Israel alone is not threatened.

If further evidence of this proposition were needed, we saw more of it on the weekend. The media airwaves were filled with the sights and sounds of the frenzied masses in Tehran "celebrating" the 16th anniversary of the Shah's downfall. They were being exhorted by the ghoulish incantations of their leaders to hate and to kill "America" and "Israel", i.e., the embodiments of liberal, democratic, western civilization and of Judaism, respectively.

It is widely known that Tehran is the main supporter, funder, organizer, and trainer of fundamentalist Islamic terror throughout the world, whether it strikes in Beit Lid, New York or Algiers. Its targets are Israel, the "decadent" West, as well as the secular Arab regimes.

In our view, therefore, it is absolutely short-sighted, blind. folly for western governments to attempt to mollify the terrorists or the governments that sustain them. Rather, as we have written before, western governments should join in the effort to root out the terrorists and to isolate their sponsors.

Hardships in raising disabled son

I am responding to the recent article in The CJN of Feb. 2 by Leila Speisman. I am the parent of a disabled child. My son, Eli, is now 20. He is studying journalism at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Eli was diagnosed with spinal muscular atrophy at age one. Eli is leaving Bloorview Childrens Hospital next month, where he has resided for the past 13 years, to live in his own apartment, where attendant care will be provided.

We have come a long way with modern technology and accessible buildings, but government budget cuts have placed more burdens on the caregivers of the physically challenged. Chronic care institutions are no longer an option to the family. We live in the age of managed care.

In the late '70s when I searched for a Jewish school for Eli, I was told they could not accommodate students with Eli's physical needs. Eli subsequently attended Sunnyview Public School. He had tutors over the years to provide some basic Jewish education.

I have not received any assistance from the Jewish community, despite the many challenges I have faced over the years. Eli has received tremendous support in his current environment.

When Eli was at home we had no support from the Jewish community. Day-to-day living was very stressful. We were involved with organizations such as the Muscular Dystrophy Association and the Easter Seals Society who had services for the disabled. No synagogue offered visits or support. You just struggled as best you could.

The day came when I had to admit Eli to Bloorview for respite care. Subsequently, he was admitted on a long-term basis.

In all the years Eli has resided in Bloorview, the synagogue visiting committees have found no time or need to visit him, even when he was acutely ill. It was the chaplain at Bloorview who was available.

In closing, I would like to add that I am encouraged to learn the rabbis of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto and the Toronto Board of Rabbis have said they will support those parents with disabled children in the community.

Vigilance needed on euthanasia

In his article on passive euthanasia (CJN, Feb. 2), Rabbi Mark Dratch concludes that in certain cases passive euthanasia "may be compatible with Torah values."

While these values are based on the highest ethical principles, much of current medical practice is founded on the goal of providing cost-effective treatment and does not concern itself particularly with moral content. More than ever before, vigilence is required to ensure that decisions taken on behalf of the afflicted reflect halachic guidelines and not those of other forces.

Artist's Jewishness influenced his work

It was a pleasure to see the "King of Comics" get some recognition in Sheldon Kirshner's Jewish World column (CJN, Feb. 2), but unfortunately you got his name wrong. The name he used throughout most of his life was Jack Kirby, not Joe Kirby. The confusion probably came about because he worked through most of the 1940s and 1950s with a partner named Joe Simon.

Kirby's Jewishness occasionally influenced his work. The romance Different, which he and Simon wrote and drew back in 1950, dealt with anti-Semitism in a small American town, although the word itself is never mentioned. In it, a family are welcomed by the townspeople only to be shunned after the grandparents come to visit and their Jewish roots are made known. The story was apparently a personal favorite of Kirby's, and just as Kirby changed his name from Jacob Kurtzberg to Jack Kirby, the father of the story's heroine had changed his from Jacoby Wilheim to Jack Williams.

Like so many others early comic book artist and writers, Kirby grew up in the Jewish tenements of lower East Side New York in the '20s and '30s. That atmosphere colored his work, giving a gritty quality even to science fiction dystopias set on other planets. One of his last published works was a story set in the New York tenenments of that era. It seemed to be part of a much larger semi-autobiographical work, but, if it was, the rest still hasn't seen print.

Anti-terrorism lacks Entebbe spirit

Prof. Ehud Sprinzak makes several factual errors in his comments regarding terror bombings (CJN, Jan. 26), not the least of which is that he counts only the murdered as victims. He should have also included the several hundred injured in these terror attacks since the Oslo Accord, many of whom lost limbs, eyes, or were left with other grave and permanent injuries.

To these numbers, one should also add the 100 dead and 200 injured in the terror bombings of the Jewish centre in Buenos Aires. They too were victims of the "peace process." At no other time did any government of Israel leave such a heinious crime against Jews anywhere go unanswered. Only the present government, so as not to rock the boat for their "peace partner" Yasser Arafat, would let the perpetrators off without punishment.

It is hard to accept that a country which in the past was able to mount an operation thousands of miles from its borders to rescue its people from Entebbe, finds itself now paralyzed in fighting terror in its own backyard.

Sprinzak is asking Israelis to accept violent death as a normal component of their daily lives. To what end? So that their government can continue its failed experiment?

The sacrifices he is asking for might be understandable, although reluctantly, in times of war.

But as the price of peace?

Perspectives

The dilemma of waging peace

The following are excerpted remarks delivered by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin Jan. 23 on Israel Television after the terrorist bombings at Beit Lid.

Citizens of Israel, soldiers and commanders of the IDF, members of the Security Services:

Those who were severely injured yesterday were wounded by a new form of terrorism used by our Palestinian Islamic extremist enemies. We have experienced this type of terrorism in Israel only in the past two years. Previously, we experienced it with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

This is a type of terrorism used by lunatic people who are prepared to strap explosives to their bodies, or place them in their cars, in order to kill Israelis, and in order to eliminate the chance for peace in the most complex conflict which has existed between us and the Arab world — the conflict between us and the Palestinians.

We must contend with these hate-filled lunatics, and I am convinced that just as we foiled some of their attacks, we will fight them with all of our might, and I am certain that over time we will find the solution for them as well.

They have chosen to attack us inside sovereign Israel. They have chosen to attack us in places where they still have freedom of movement. This obligates all of us to be alert, to be careful, to warn of anything suspicious. There is no choice. The reality today is that everyone is the army and the entire country is on the front line, until we overcome them.

To our enemies we say: as in the past, we will continue to fight you, both now and in the future. We will continue building our homes and our families here. We will continue our search for peace and at the same time we will pursue you and hit you hard. No border will stand in our way. And we will eliminate you. We will overcome you. No enemy will defeat us.

I know that many are asking: have you brought us peace, or terror? The road to peace is not easy. About 17 years ago peace was made for the first time between an Arab country and Israel, due to efforts by then prime minister Menachem Begin, who had the courage to make a painful decision and pay a painful price for peace.

Today, we are continuing on the path of peace. We want to solve the painful problem between us and the Palestinians, the 100-year-old conflict. We achieved peace with Jordan, a full and contractual peace, and we will continue our efforts to reach peace. There is no other alternative. We will achieve peace, for this is the long-term solution to terrorism as well, even if it is difficult now.

I am convinced the path the government has taken is the path which will lead to the end of control over another people. The Palestinians in the territories are an entity different from us — religiously, politically, nationally.

This path must lead to a separation, though not according to the pre-1967 borders. Jerusalem will remain united forever. The security border of the State of Israel will be situated on the Jordan River. We want to reach a separation between us and them. We do not want a majority of the Jewish residents of the State of Israel, 98 per cent of whom live within the borders of sovereign Israel, including united Jerusalem, to be subject to terrorism.

We must break this cycle of hatred. We must break it so that we, as mothers, fathers — and I as a grandfather — will not have to undergo the pain of eulogizing our good, fine children. I am convinced that, despite all of the pain and difficulty, the people of Israel have known how to overcome even greater difficulties than those which we have experienced today. The residents of the State of Israel have known how to withstand wars and terrorism, and have always known how to dream about peace and to contend with enemies, while at the same time building a wonderful country — one with 4.4 million Jews, and with a total of 5.3 million citizens.

We will continue the struggle to achieve peace, to build the country and to fight the enemies of Israel and the enemies of peace. We will not yield to moments of weakness. The Jewish people's special ability, throughout all of its history — the ability of the State of Israel to overcome the wars in which thousands of its sons fell — is the ability within us which makes us special, and we will achieve our goal.

Fellow citizens of Israel ... we are a strong country, we have a tremendous army, we have a great ability to achieve all of our goals if we will define them as peace, security, building and development. There are difficult moments and we have to overcome them. We must find the denominator common to us all, and thus achieve the dream of generations of Jews in the 2,000 years of exile. We will fulfill the Jewish belief in the return to Zion, in building a strong country in which we will live in peace and security.

By DAVID NEWMAN

At the outset of World War II, the Yishuv in Palestine was faced with a tactical problem.

On the one hand, the Jewish leadership wanted to continue its struggle for a Jewish homeland despite the discriminatory British White Paper which had limited Jewish immigration. At the same time, Britain was an ally in the fight against Nazi Germany which, given the gravity of the situation, was a more immediate problem facing world Jewry.

It was at this critical stage in Jewish history that David Ben-Gurion made his famous comment to the effect that "we will fight the British White Paper as though there were no Nazi Germany, and we will fight the German threat as though there were no White Paper."

The tactical problem facing Israel today is similar in many ways. On the one hand, the Israeli government has courageously gone ahead with implementing a process designed to bring about greater political stability between Israel and her neighbors. At the same time, we have been witness to some of the most ferocious terrorist outrages which Israel has known during 45 years of conflict.

The arguments for and against the contribution of the peace process place the Israeli government in a delicate situation. Those of us who have always supported the peace process will argue that this senseless terrorism and violence is further proof that a solution has to be reached. For those opposed to the process, the recent terror is proof there never can be peace with the Palestinians and that the only solution is to withdraw from the peace process altogether.

Clearly the government, while desiring to forge ahead with the process, cannot ignore the heartfelt cries and genuine grief of the majority of the Israeli populace who question the validity of a peace process which has not brought about any significant improvement in their personal security.

For a public which still has to be won over to the idea of negotiating with past enemies, there have to be tangible benefits in return for concessions, especially a cessation of open hostility and violence, as a prerequisite to further advancement along the road to a final territorial settlement.

The fact that the Islamic fundamentalist groups emerged long before the Oslo Accords and that they would carry out their murderous suicide bombings within Israel regardless of whether or not there is a peace process is largely irrelevant to the populist argument. What, they rightly ask, is the point of continuing with the negotiations if the violence and the terror do not cease?

Despite Israeli attempts to force Yasser Arafat into action, the government has so far been unsuccessful in its fight against the growing fundamentalist threat. There is no question about it — from an Israeli perspective, Arafat has so far proved to be a great failure. Arafat's position as leader is probably in greater danger than at any other time during the past three decades.

The threats to his leadership place Arafat in jeopardy. Had he been able to make the transition to a smoother, more efficient form of administration, one which was less dictatorial and which involved greater participation, then maybe he would have been able to exercise greater control.

Why, many ask, if Arafat is unable to control his own turf should we continue to deal with him? At least, if we are going to negotiate, let us deal with someone who can deliver the goods. If he is unable to control his own people, then maybe we should cease negotiations altogether or wait for another, stronger, leader to emerge. Whether the alternative leadership comes from amongst the ranks of the PLO, from the more extreme fundamentalist groups, or from amongst the more moderate Palestinian intellectuals is not the issue. For Israel, the issue at hand concerns the ability of the leader to exercise control and to deliver the goods which have been promised as part of the agreement on limited autonomy and Palestinian empowerment.

Making peace does not mean we have to take a soft-handed approach if our security and safety continue to be threatened. If Arafat is unable, or unwilling, to deal with the Islamic fundamentalist threat, then it is for Israel to take up the challenge. By doing so, we can serve warning that despite our desire to achieve an agreement, this will not be at the price of our security.

Even the pro-peace government of Rabin, Peres and Weizmann, who between them have done more for Israel's security and military deterrent over the past 40 years than any other combination of living Israeli leaders or generals, will not be prepared to sit and wait for Arafat to take action. They will act to rid the region of the fundamentalist cancer, one which does not recognize the basic values of human life or personal dignity.

Move towards physical separation

But this does not mean the peace process should stop. While fighting the fundamentalists, we must make even greater efforts to move towards a final territorial agreement. The current situation of interim autonomy leads us nowhere. There are only two ways from here — either backwards to pre-Oslo, or forward to separate territories.

We should go ahead with the difficult task of delivering territories which best accomodate the geo-ethnic realities of both Palestinians and Israeli settlers. Borders which take account of Israel's strategic interests and control of valuable water resources must be negotiated. We must move towards the idea of physical separation between two peoples who are unable, and unwilling, to live together. If we once thought of future boundaries open to the movement of people and goods, then we should reassess those objectives. If fundamentalist terrorism continues, we should create a situation in which they remain on their side of a well-fortified boundary, with little chance of infiltrating into Israel. There will be no mutual economic benefits of cooperation as long as open transit brings terror and violence with it.

I never understood the meaning of the slogan "to fight for peace." It had always appeared a contradiction in terms. If one desires peace, one does not need to fight. If one fights, then it clearly cannot be to achieve peace. But in light of recent events, the meaning has taken on a new clarity. Israel must fight, and fight hard, against the fundamentalist threat if it is ever to achieve peace. To paraphrase Ben-Gurion, we must continue the peace process as if there were no Islamic fundamentalist terrorists, while we must fight the terrorists as if there were no peace process. Only by a concerted effort simultaneously on both fronts can we move towards an era of greater stability and security.

Some desultory thoughts

Three quite unrelated items help to paint a corner of today's historical canvas.

On Worship: The bulletin of a San Francisco congregation has an announcement by its rabbi, which reads as follows.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Clergyman quits sports — Why a local clergyman stopped attending athletic events.

• Everytime I went, they asked me for money.

• People with whom I had to sit didn't seem very friendly.

• The seats were too hard and not at all comfortable.

• I went to many games but the coach never came to call on me.

• The referee made a decision with which I could not agree.

• I suspected that I was sitting with some hypocrites. They came to see their friends and what others were wearing rather than to see the game.

• Some games went into overtime, and I was late in getting home.

• The band played some numbers that I'd never heard before.

• It seems that the games are scheduled when I want to do other things.

• I was taken to too many games by my parents when I was growing up.

Wiedergutmachung. The word means "making good again" and describes the effort Germany has made to compensate its victims of Nazi days. Usually it means reparation in kind or money; at other times it contains an invitation to people born in a particular city to revisit the old homestead and share a few days with other refugees they have not seen in half a century.

Since 1945 the incidence of wars has increased

A Toronto correspondent now tells me he has received a letter from the premier of Brandenburg province in Germany, headquartered in Potsdam, which contained a personal invitation to attend the commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camp in Sachsenhausen. The observance will take place at the old camp site on April 23.

My correspondent writes me that he accepted the invitation "in the name of all those whom I saw being killed and all those who never came back except in cardboard boxes containing their ashes."

And finally, war. Speaking of Germany, there exists in that country an organization entitled Working Group for Investigating the Causes of War, which is active at the University of Hamburg. It's latest statistics reveal the following:

Since the end of World War II in 1945, the incidence of wars has increased steadily to altogether 187 wars. The past year, 1994, ended as it began, with a new war, making it 41 for the year. The largest number occurred in Africa with 12; Asia with nine; Near and Middle East, seven; Latin America, six; Europe, three; and others four. The organization estimates that these wars have caused the death of 6½ million people.

What this statistic does, among other things, is to discredit the opinion so many people hold: that ancient days were less civilized than ours. We may even come to the uncomfortable conclusion that it is precisely the other way around.

The importance of having babies

There are millions of reasons to add a baby to your family, now that you're getting too much sleep.

Babies fill your arms and your heart and your nights and their diapers. Babies perpetuate the Jewish people and the makers of disposable diapers, the powder, bottles, the formula concocters and the manufacturers of tiny bibs with snaps that pop through the terry cloth the first time they're used.

By Evelyn Meyer Rancaz

Babies are good alarm clocks, imprecise, but useful. They are attuned to an internal clock that rings with hunger, with damp, with cold and with an unerring sense of just when Mom has her hands full, her doorbell ringing, her boss on the phone and her red shirt in the wash load of white napkins and tablecloths.

Babies are cause for celebration, be it a baby naming or a brit milah, an occasion, as Miss Manners points out, where everyone has a good time except the guest of honor.

Babies are a reason for wrapping paper with pastel teddy bears on it, for balloons that proclaim, "It's a Girl!," for bubblegum cigars with wrappers reading "It's a Boy!"

Babies are the reason big sisters get bunk beds, older brothers share dresser drawers and the "designated guest room" suddenly overflows with diaper cases, wind-up swings, fold-up strollers and portable players.

For tiny people who can't go anywhere or do anything, babies generate an astonishing amount of debris. One minute, a home is tidy and neat; the next minute, there are booties on the bureau, a car seat in the foyer, milk bottles in the bedroom, mounds of wipes and creams and cotton swabs on the dining table, and a veritable library of pamphlets, folders, coupons and manuals every where you turn.

Most major computer systems come equipped with fewer documents than a baby home from the hospital: promotional copies of a dozen magazines, coupons for unheard of unguents and creams, and forms that presage a life of bureaucratic paperwork.

They confirm the miracle of creation

Babies are the mainstay of an entire branch of book and magazine publishing, which issues a steady flow of documents designed to tell a mother what to do in the event of red spots or hiccups or fever, but unfindable at the exact moment the baby is actually, hicupping, or heating up.

Books on baby naming (Griselda? Xerxes?) say every name has a meaning, although most names mean "Mom's Uncle in Ottawa."

Books on baby feeding say to start solids at four months, or five months, or six months, and to begin with cereal or banana or a pizza with anchovies and green pepper. These books do not agree with each other; if they did, we could somehow get by with fewer of them.

Books exist on teaching your baby to read, on teaching your baby to exercise and on toilet training your baby by the time he's a year old. Those books miss a valuable point: the unique thing about babies is their babyhood. We know they have unlimited potential, but they have a limited amount of time to simply wave their hands in the air, play tag with their toes, smile gaseously, chirp in a deliciously meaningful argot of their own, pull their grandma's hair, clutch their grandpa's fingers and absorb the noisy, colorful, fragrant, textured world around them.

Babies serve a lot of useful purposes. They teach their siblings how to help, how to be self-sufficient and how to grow up. They teach their parents that nothing else is as important as a squirmy, helpless, cockeyed, slightly drooling ticket to the future ... nothing matters as much as the toddler, the kid, the teen, the parent, that the baby becomes.

Babies confirm the miracle of creation by repeating it. Babies are joy and mess and delight and work and happiness and responsibility, all in one demanding, comic, scary, fabulous package.

Babies do so many wonderful things that every family should have one. Or at least one more. That's the conclusion we reached five years ago, when today's birthday boy was born.

He turned out to be our last baby, the third, the boy, the leprechan, the charmer, the adventurer, the little guy.

My editor is incorrect in teasing that we added this particular baby to our brood just to provide me with a permanent source of column fodder. That is, he's incorrect in general ... but he's right today.

This IDF helps out dolphins in Israel

The achievements of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) are known far and wide, but the IDF we speak of here is a completely different agency, associated with the activity of dolphins in a new and unsuspected role. This is to tell you about the IDF, Israeli Dolphins' Friends.

By Carl Alpert

We call attention to the fact that dolphins are no strangers to this country. They apparently inhabited the waters off our coast at least in Roman times. There are pictures of dolphins on the mosaic flooring in a tomb at Beit Shean, and in a building uncovered during the recent explorations in Zippori.

A research project carried out for the past year and a half by a team operating out of the Recanati Centre for Maritime Studies at the University of Haifa, reports sightings of more than 800 dolphins during that period, though the figure may be less because of repetitive reports. The dolphins are gregarious creatures and travel in groups, known as pods.

But what role do they play in "defence" of our coastal waters? Since the creation of the state, about 50 dolphins have been washed up on our shores, dead or dying — 20 of these in the last two years. Careful study of the dead dolphins established they were in poor physical condition, suffering from pollution or bacterial or viral factors in the water. Because of their delicate systems, dolphins are the very first to suffer from harmful elements in the water. It is their role as early ecological indicators of pollution that makes them guardians of our shores, and local scientists are taking seriously the warning inherent in the increasing dolphin fatalities.

ISRAELI DOLPHINS' FRIENDS

Oz Goffman, a student, who is preparing his Master's thesis on the subject of the dolphins, has become so enamored of his subject that he appears to be devoting his life to them. With the active encouragement of Prof. Ehud Spanier, of the university's Centre for Maritime Studies, public interest is also being mobilized.

The new organization is known as Israeli Dolphins' Friends. Volunteers are on call to render immediate service when reports come in of injured dolphins stranded on the shore. Immediate treatment, medication and care may often save the creature's life and enable it to rejoin its pod out at sea. The real need is for construction of a convalescent pool, where the ailing dolphins may be kept for some time, until fully recovered, when they can then be sent back to their families. But with so many human social and economic needs, who has time or money for sick dolphins?

The team at the University of Haifa is operating without a budget and without space, but is driven by a spirit of determination and love of the playful creatures. Perhaps there are lovers of dolphins elsewhere, who might wish to make common cause with them.

Or Yehuda's transformation

Sheldon Kirshner recently visited an Israeli town which has been transformed with the assistance of Canadian Jews.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

"Once, people were ashamed to admit they were from Or Yehuda," recalls Rina Sofer, the local librarian.

"Now there's pride," she adds. "Physically, the town has changed completely. It looked like a slum. You felt you were in the Third World. You saw sick-looking people in the street."

Or Yehuda, 15 kilometres southeast of Tel Aviv and on the flight path of planes heading toward Ben-Gurion Airport, has undergone a startling metamorphosis in the past 15 years.

Indeed, it is an excellent example of urban renewal in Israel, a town to be emulated.

Or Yehuda, a pleasant municipality with a population of 25,000, was rescued from abject neglect, self-pity and apathy by Project Renewal, an ambitious social engineering plan conceived by the then prime minister, Menachem Begin.

Begin, a Polish Jew, won the 1977 election largely because of disaffected Sephardi Jews in stunted development towns like Or Yehuda. They helped the Likud vault to power. They were angry and bitter voters who felt left behind in Israel's scramble to affluence.

In line with Zionist ideology, they had been ingathered, but never really properly absorbed into the Jewish state.

The overall objective of Project Renewal — a partnership between the Israeli government, the Jewish Agency and a specific community in the Diaspora — was to improve the quality of life and to provide better access to the benefits of the welfare state for more than half a million Israelis. These broad goals would be met by improving dilapidated neighborhoods and by providing much needed social and educational programs.

Although Project Renewal's success was dependent on overseas funds, citizen participation was essential. Ultimately, the residents themselves had to take responsibility for their neighborhoods.

Once described as a "social jungle" by a criminologist, Or Yehuda was certainly a test case for Project Renewal's effectiveness.

By the late 1970s, Or Yehuda, which began as a transit camp and a ma'abarot (shantytown) for new immigrants, was an ugly, depressing, underdeveloped place, seemingly light years away from the dazzle and glitz of modern Tel Aviv.

"The socio-economic situation here was bad," says David Mutzafi, Or Yehuda's director of education.

Much to its fortune, the town was "adopted" by the Ontario and Atlantic regions of the United Israel Appeal (UIA), which worked closely with the administrators of Project Renewal.

In all, Canadian Jewry was linked up with 11 Project Renewal rehabilitation schemes throughout Israel: Toronto with Beit Dagon, Rehovot, Eilat and the Eilot district in the Arava; Montreal with Beersheva and Yerucham; Winnipeg with Gan Yavneh; Calgary with Maskeret Batya; Ottawa with Netanya; and Vancouver with Kfar Yona.

By all accounts, the guiding hand behind Or Yehuda's transformation was a retired Toronto furniture manufacturer named Lou Sklar, who was convinced that it could be turned around. For his efforts, he won the 1986 Kaplan Prize, Israel's premier honor recognizing achievements in economic innovation, productivity and social service.

Yet simple goodwill was not enough. It had to be matched with hard, cold cash. And this is where UIA comes in. Since the late 1970s, UIA has channelled about $8 million into Or Yehuda.

Librarian Rina Sofer.

And the results are impressive.

The single most important Canadian project, the Or Yehuda-Canada Cultural Centre, was finished in 1991. "It's the beating heart of Or Yehuda, the real focal point of our community," says its director, Shimon Hazout.

Originally, the centre consisted of one small building with pitifully few facilities. UIA invested $3 million and the centre was greatly expanded.

Its showpiece is a 470-seat theatre, with an overbooked subscription concert series that attracts music lovers from around the region. The auditorium is dedicated in memory of Lynda Pearl-Cartu of St. Catharines, Ontario. A mural in front of the theatre, designed by Gad Ullman, charts Or Yehuda's progress as a town on the move.

The library, an integral component of the centre, is another indicator of the remarkable strides Or Yehuda has made since Project Renewal came on line.

When Sofer, the librarian, arrived here from Paris 20 years ago, townspeople were anything but well read. "We had about 2,000 books and about 100 regulars who borrowed books from the library. People were afraid to come here. We were too sophisticated for them."

Today, the library, with an immensely expanded collection, is in high demand. "Now we buy the best literature, and we have readers for it."

The heightened interest in reading is a function of the upgrading of Or Yehuda's education system. Until the late 1960s, there was not even a high school in Or Yehuda. Now there are two high schools. Not too long ago, most youngsters did not complete their matriculation exams. Now upwards of 80 percent finish high school.

Or Yehuda was also plagued by substandard housing. The majority of residents lived in hastily constructed, rat-infested rental flats, in tiny shacks built of sheet metal and asbestos, and in old Arab dwellings (Palestinian Arabs resided here until the 1948 War of Independence).

Thanks to Project Renewal, cramped apartments were renovated, somehow enlarged and sold to the occupants. (By then, the shacks and the deteriorating Arab dwellings had been demolished.)

Not surprisingly, Or Yehuda was entirely lacking in green spaces. But now, due to Project Renewal, five parks and neighborhood gardens grace the town.

Canadians also funded construction of two home environment centres for children from deprived families. In many cases, their parents are drug addicts and/or mentally disturbed, according to Nurit Aharonson, a truant officer who works at one of the centres. As a result, their offspring tend to suffer from emotional problems.

Usually, the kids, aged 5 to 10, spend five hours a day here. They are helped with their homework and served lunch (their hot meal of the day). And if they wish, they can take a shower.

(When Project Renewal was still a twinkle in Begin's eyes, UIA built a kindergarten in Or Yehuda, funded by Saul and Nettye Podnick of Owen Sound, Ontario. This school, and the day cares which have sprung up here since, have enabled young mothers to join the work force and bolster family incomes.)

Canadian funds are also giving Or Yehuda a spacious sports centre, which is expected to be finished soon. UIA is contributing $900,000 to the project, according to Victor Yagoda, a UIA official based in Israel.

Due to the town's new positive image, a middle-class subdivision is rising on its outer edges. To Sofer, it is a good omen. "Many educated people left Or Yehuda in the early days," she explains. "Now they're coming back, helping to create a middle class."

Despite all its achievements, Or Yehuda is still on the road toward full rehabilitation.

Only 10 per cent of its high school graduates attend university, one of the lowest rates in Israel. The town is short of industry, forcing three-quarters of its workers to commute. And many of the approximately 1,000 new Soviet immigrants who've settled here since 1989, mainly from Central Asia, have mediocre educational backgrounds.

All things considered, however, Or Yehuda has come a long way since Project Renewal, which is scheduled to be phased out by the year 2000. But with its new-found confidence, Yagoda hopes that Or Yehuda will be able to manage without foreign subsidies.

"We don't want to create a dependency. We want them to stand up on their own two feet."

Ethiopian literacy

Fifty thousand Ethiopian immigrants have poured into Israel in the past 15 years, but they have not had an easy time of it.

Rabbis have questioned the authenticity of their Judaism. Unemployment has bedeviled them. And for many Ethiopian Jews, the Hebrew language has been an imposing challenge, adding one more obstacle to their integration into Israeli society.

With regard to the last point, the Ethiopians are struggling because theirs is a community with an oral tradition where reading and writing were not considered terribly important. Consequently, while Ethiopian adults speak Amharic, Ethiopia's national language, they are generally functionally illiterate in Amharic. This affects their ability to learn Hebrew.

Yaffa Schuster-Baronovitz, a PhD student at the Hebrew University, noticed this phenomenon while working with Ethiopians in Upper Nazareth in 1986 and 1987. There, she coordinated arts and crafts and dance projects.

Schuster-Baronovitz, a 42-year-old mother of five, came to the conclusion that the Ethiopians could best grasp Hebrew by learning to read and write in Amharic. In October 1992, she started an adult literacy program called Goshrim (Bridge Builders), the only one of its kind in Israel.

"Amharic acts as the bridge between Israeli and Ethiopian culture," she explained. "As students acquire literacy in Amharic, they will be motivated to acquire the same skills in Hebrew."

Schuster-Baronovitz, whose parents are of Russian and Romanian stock, was greatly encouraged and helped by Dov Friedlander, director of the Hebrew University's Martin Buber Centre for Adult Education.

But there was resistance at the Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Absorption. For ideological reasons, officials there believed — and still do — that Ethiopian olim should learn Hebrew before Amharic. Despite their qualms about her methods, both ministries partially funded Goshrim. Also providing funds was a foundation in Germany.

There are eight classes, with up to 20 students in each class. Lessons are usually conducted at absorption centres and caravan sites throughout Israel. Students range in age from the early 20s to 70, though most are between 27 and 45. Apart from basic Hebrew, they study math and are taken on tours of Israel.

Students are recruited by teachers, fellow Ethiopians with varying degrees of fluency in Hebrew. The teachers are trained by Goshrim.

Schuster-Baronovitz believes that Goshrim has yielded positive results. But a financial crisis looms. Being skeptical about Goshrim's effectiveness, local municipalities have yet to allocate classroom space and equipment, while the Ministry of Absorption has halted funding.

There is no immediate danger that Goshrim will cease operations, but Schuster-Baronovitz realizes that new sources of revenue are sorely needed.

We are deeply saddened by the loss of our dear friend, board member and valued volunteer

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

A colleague attended a discussion at his local clergy association about the way to obtain salvation, titled How To Be Saved.

My friend, the rabbi, found it difficult to convey the idea that for Jews, salvation comes through performing mitzvot.

One of the Christian ministers there could not relate to this idea, since he only understood salvation to come through faith in Jesus. Eventually, he remembered that "it goes back to the idea that Judaism is a religion of deed, while Christianity is a religion of creed."

We rabbis are constantly asking people to do what Judaism demands of them, yet we hardly ever speak of faith. But faith is an important aspect of what it means to be Jewish.

Many of you are familiar with the song Ani ma'amin, which begins "ani ma'amin be'emunah shelema b'viat hamashiach (I believe with complete faith in the coming of the Messiah)."

The song uses emunah, the Hebrew word for faith. While many people know this song, I suspect most give no thought to the content of these lyrics.

Ours is a confusing, disorienting world. I am reminded of the great thinker, John Stuart Mill, raised by atheist parents who forbade the discussion of anything religious, or the observance of any religious rituals and traditions. When he grew to manhood, Mill said he felt a tremendous gap in his life, like a ship without a rudder.

I think Mill was describing a malaise all too frequent in our society. It is a malaise which probably explains the increase in teenage suicides. Young people who take their lives may be afflicted with a lack of emunah, resulting in a lack of stability in their lives. I also believe many people, both young and old, who are addicted to drugs and alcohol are desperately searching for some constancy. The rising rate of clinical depression in our time also bespeaks the uncertainty plaguing so many.

One of the ways we develop emunah is to observe those whom we know have it. Such a person has a sense of stability, of foundation. Look at the chassidic rebbes. They took their followers with them on a quest for emunah and taught them its power, stability and confidence.

If you want to learn to have emunah, you must allow for the possibility that you already have it; you simply may not be allowing it to be expressed. You may have inhibitions about admitting this. You may say, "I'm afraid of what others may think of me if I become more religious," or "I'm too old to change." You may even say "I don't think I can."

Emunah helps us bring together our heads and our hearts. Many people say they believe in G-d, but they usually don't have their hearts in that belief. Some self-proclaimed "deep believers" rarely attend church services, and are no different from those Jews who profess belief in G-d and their loyalty to the Ten Commandments, but do little to prove it.

Putting our hearts into our religious practices allows us a much greater return. If we are to obtain emunah, we must involve ourselves in the study and observance of the Torah. To bring your heart and head together, you must not be content with what you already know or do. Be ready and willing to sit and learn, and then to go out and do more. As the rabbis tell us in the Midrash, speaking in G-d's name, "through the mitzvot they will find Me."

Rabbi Levi Ha-Levi of Jerusalem tells of a man who came one day to his little synagogue, a Jew who had escaped from the Soviet Union and who wanted a bar mitzvah ceremony for his son. He described himself as a chiloni, a secularist, who feared his son might someday resent him if he withheld his Jewish identity.

But his real reasons were not revealed until after the bar mitzvah, when the rabbi found himself alone with the man. The man told him he had never had a bar mitzvah, and grew up without access to a Torah.

He was no secular Jew. He wanted his son to get close to a Torah, to touch it, kiss it, read from it and hold it. When the father received an aliyah, it was the bar mitzvah he never had.

For the Jew, there is one path which must be followed to obtain emunah — the way of the Torah.

USDS students create ketubot

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An exhibition of more than a dozen hand-made ketubot (Jewish marriage contracts) produced by Grade 8 students at the United Synagogue Day School on Bathurst Street is on view at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue throughout the month of February.

The students drew, inked, painted and otherwise constructed the ketubot as part of a research project on Jewish marriage. They received inspiration from a visit to Beth Tzedec's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum, which holds some 100 historic ketubot from the Cecil Roth collection of Judaica, some dating back to the 17th century.

Museum curator Dorion Liebgott talked to the students about traditional symbols found on the marriage contracts, which art teacher Joan Loewenstein asked them to incorporate as well as their own. The result is "wonderful and amazing," says Loewenstein.

"They displayed such a sense of life when they did this. They took the project very seriously and it took them a long, long time. They put their hearts and souls into it. They also astounded themselves with the results."

The students' ketubot are displayed in the glass cases outside the main sanctuary.

Jewish Life

Library leads to personal destiny

By JEAN M. GERBER

Even today, 34 years after the summer of 1961, the smell of a library reminds me of it — that combination of dust, old paper, wooden floors covered with worn linoleum, stale air and the mustiness of books rarely opened.

GUEST VOICES

As a young undergraduate, I was fortunate to land a plummy summer job for a professor in the Department of History at Pennsylvania State University. As his researcher, I, a fledgling student of history, was assigned a simple task: survey documents relating to World War II for references to Count von Stauffenberg, the German general who led the abortive 1944 attempt on Hitler's life. Whether the professor's biography was ever published to scholarly acclaim or condemnation I never knew; but that summer's research changed my life in ways I was not even aware of at the time, and in ways that were immediate.

The major portion of my research was in the 23 volumes covering the Nuremberg Trials.

Those volumes were found in the womb of the Penn State Library in the "core," an inner area, windowless, ill-lit, musty with neglect, and hot as only rooms in midsummer Pennsylvania can be.

It was miserable. I needed the money. I knew this job was a step toward graduate school and notice by my professors.

Outside the sun shone. Outside were swimming, picnics, newfound friends, many of them Jewish, one of whom I would marry. Inside was dust on the seemingly endless pages of testimony.

I was not totally ignorant of the Holocaust, but the simple fact was that I had gone through 12 years of school without studying anything about the destruction of Europe's Jews. Never had I read a book about it, talked with a survivor of the camps, or even had it mentioned in my freshman survey of western history (I still have the books and I looked it up).

I knew because I had seen the bodies stacked like cardwood, the mass graves, the faces of the barely living frozen in the camera's eye.

I was 5 when the lights came on in Allentown, Pa., after VE day. One night we went to a near-by church to see films brought back by a returning soldier. I have no idea why my parents took me to that event; surely they were sorry 10 minutes into it, when the soldier began to describe the images flickering on the screen — faces of the survivors and the bodies of the dead. Then it had to be explained to me what the Allies had found in Germany and Poland.

So in the first few days in the library I had some remembering to do. Did von Stauffenberg come into the pages of that litany of denial? Only twice. More compelling was the drone of excuses given by the accused, and those not accused but called to testify. I remember the grotesque mutilations of children and women by operations that had no purpose but to torment. I remember how I pictured the sounds of that trial — not the drama of Judgement at Nuremberg, but monotone questions and monotone answers translated into monotone English. Everyone had been someplace else, looking away from the camera. But I had seen the faces looking into the camera, and the faces that would never look at anything again.

Count von Stauffenberg ceased to be of account, while a pulsating anger took hold of me. How could I care about the plot to kill Hitler when so much killing was going on daily in the pages of the trials? When I could step outside the library, smell the rich summer afternoon air, I was still angry. So I took it up with my companions. They, after all, were Jews. How could they live with it? To my surprise, they knew little more than I did, for of course they had studied the same version of the war as I had, a war without Jews and without concentration camps.

One friend in particular, the man who became my husband, recalled how he had heard of DPs in the kitchen of his parents' Brooklyn apartment. Whispered stories heard through thin walls, the sound of grown-ups weeping had to be explained to children unable to sleep, but too young to hear the whole truth — that was how he had learned. His story made me a bit desperate. Surely someone would tell us what it means.

Overall I felt a terrible hopelessness as I read on. This time, wouldn't the story have a different ending? Hitler would be killed; the war would end; the camps would be opened; thousands would be saved. But at the end of the day, the ending was always the same.

I felt a terrible hopelessness

So I went to work each day, hot, angry, and aware that my university education had let me down, somehow. I needed the job but I hated myself for doing it.

I did it. At the end of the six weeks, I had looked at every page of the trials. I don't remember if I found the man, or his co-conspirators mentioned. Lacking German, I was spared the search through German language publications. To rectify this deficiency, I enrolled in a basic German course — simple historical essays, which we laboriously translated.

About six weeks into the course, the topic was World War II. And, unbelievably, I translated something like the following:

"About 400,000 Jews and other minorities were imprisoned in camps where many died."

Just that, nothing else. I approached the teacher, himself a young graduate student. "Excuse me, 400,000? Many died? What is this?" He hemmed and stuttered. Of course not, but ... this was the required text. That day I ended my German lessons with disgust at all of us who were collaborating in the beginning of a lie.

And finally I began to realize that my own personal fate had become bound up with the story of those people in the flickering films of the war, those in the pages of dusty books, those erased from history by a quisling German text, and those alive and wanting to understand what had taken place.

It would take several more years of search and reflection, personal anguish and decision, but at that moment I began to link myself with the living people who demanded that they not be forgotten, locked in musty pages, ashes turned under as fertilizer. It was somewhere in that summer that I knew I would become a Jew.

Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made

There is a difference but it's not price

Benjamin's has been providing meaningful, dignified funeral services for three generations. The real difference isn't price. It's the lasting value of experience, and the caring personal service every family receives at Benjamin's.

On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.

According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

Wallace helps launch chair in mood disorders

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I couldn't sleep, my sex drive was non-existent, I couldn't eat, my hands were shaking, I thought my whole life was a fraud."

At the time, the veteran journalist was being sued for libel by Gen. William Westmoreland. He said he was afraid to tell co-workers about his symptoms because they would think he was "crazy."

His family doctor for 20 years "didn't catch on to the symptoms," Wallace, 76, said. He ended up in hospital.

The Jewish TV celebrity was in Toronto to launch a $2.2-million campaign initiated by the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry to establish a chair in mood disorders at the University of Toronto.

Wallace, who now takes antidepressant medication, said it took him a long time to get over the "shame" of being mentally ill and that the stigma attached to depression is one of the major obstacles to its treatment.

Mike Wallace

"You wouldn't be ashamed of measles and this is a treatable disease," he said at a press conference.

He urged anyone suffering from depression to seek medical help because it is effective. "I'm more alert, I have a better perception of things, I'm a better guy since I've been on the [anti-depressant] drug and I intend to continue to take it."

More than twice as many women as men are subject to depression for reasons that are unclear, said Dr. Sidney Kennedy of the Clarke.

About one in every five Canadians will have a significant depressive episode in their lifetime, Kennedy said, and the incidence is increasing.

"There is alarming evidence in the 1980s and 1990s that the incidence of depression among people 18 to 30 is roughly double that of other age groups," he told the press conference.

Early detection of mental illness could save $1 billion a year in Canada in medical costs, he said.

Depression can be triggered by genetic or environmental factors, and can be treated with medication and psychotherapy.

Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities planned

TORONTO — The forty-seventh Yom Ha'atzmaut Festival will be held on May 7.

A Toronto-area tribute to the State of Israel's Independence Day will be held at the North York Civic Centre and Mel Lastman Square, North York.

This project has been in the planning since last summer. A committee representing Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Jewish National Fund and other organizations has met regularly to plan and produce the celebration.

The day-long event will feature sale of Israeli foods and Israeli products, displays, crafts, folk dancing, films, art exhibits, children's activities, a novel quiz show, an auction and more. Everyone is welcome to participate in this exciting festival; admission is free.

An evening concert in the council chambers will conclude the event. Admission to the concert will be $18.

Join hundreds of young Jewish leaders from around the world for an unforgettable experience in Israel!

Come Together

Yachdav means "Togetherness" in Hebrew. The Yachdav Mission only happens once every three years. It's a momentous, meaningful opportunity to come face to face with the most critical issues facing Israel and world Jewry today.

Mission themes are: The peace process, Jerusalem 3000, absorption of Russian and Ethiopian Olim, Israel-Diaspora relations, the development of the Negev, and much, much more. The mission also includes a side trip to Jordan and an exciting 2 day stopover in Amsterdam, featuring meetings with local young Jewish leaders and a visit to the Anne Frank Museum. Under the banner of UIA/Keren Hayesod, 500 young Jewish leaders from every corner of the world will come together during the mission. Be a part of Yachdav '95 ... Call your local federation today!

Cost: $1,795 per person from Montreal or Toronto ($1,595 for registrations received before April 28.)

Participation: Subject to a minimum gift to local UJA/CJA/UIA campaign

After decades separated, sisters finally meet

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This Christmas, Jeanette Rogerson gave her daughter a Star of David.

The gift followed Rogerson's recent discovery of her Jewish roots and her first meeting with Susan Freedman, the older sister she never knew she had.

Both women had long dreamed of having a sister. Freedman, a 55-year-old nurse, was adopted as an infant by Min and Don Stickles and raised with two brothers, also adopted, in a close and traditional Jewish family in Sudbury.

Rogerson's childhood was less secure. Her adoptive parents divorced when she was four, and she grew up in a series of Toronto foster homes. "I always wondered about my roots," the soft-spoken art consultant says.

Both were adopted at 2½ months. Only Freedman knew she was born Jewish.

In 1988, when amendments to adoption disclosure laws made birth information more accessible to Canadian adoptees, Freedman decided to apply for information about her background.

The search reached a dead end last October when the counsellor working on Freedman's case informed her the woman believed to be her mother was not, nor was there any information about her birth father.

"However," the counsellor continued, "did you know you had a sister?"

Within two months, Rogerson had been located. The two women discovered they had lived only three miles from each other for over 25 years. They met for dinner on the same mid-December day they first spoke.

"I was in shock," recalls Rogerson, sipping herbal tea in the panelled den of her sister's North York home.

They talked for almost three hours that first night, then went out again a few days later with their husbands.

They've gotten to know each other's grown children and when interviewed were looking forward to a Meet My Sister brunch arranged by Rogerson.

"I think we have a lot in common," says Rogerson. "I think Susan is very loving."

"I hear you're stubborn," teases Freedman, as the two sisters laugh in unison.

A recent Saturday morning found Rogerson at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue with the Freedman family to attend services and hear Freedman's childhood friend Judy Feld Carr speak from the bimah.

After services, Rabbi Joseph Kelman greeted the family and learned Freedman had a sister. When he learned that Rogerson was raised Protestant, the rabbi wondered whether she was feeling "a little mixed up."

"I'm quite religious," says Rogerson, who has found "some conflicting things" about her dual religious identities but feels good about her newly discovered heritage.

The sisters are now looking for a Jewish class to take together. "We're looking for something easier, sort of a beginner's [course]," says Rogerson.

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — The first person San Francisco 49er Harris Barton thought of after winning his third Super Bowl game was not himself, nor his best friend, quarterback Steve Young, but his late father, Paul Barton, who died seven months ago at age 57 after a lengthy bout with brain cancer.

"I played pro football despite initially being discouraged from doing so by my father. But once I was drafted by the 49ers, he not only accepted my decision to play but often came to the West Coast from our hometown in Atlanta to see me perform. He always boosted my spirits, especially if I felt bad after losing a game," said Barton after the 49ers' decisive 49-26 victory over the San Diego Chargers.

"Since 1994, it was my turn to boost his spirits. After every game last year, I would fly home to spend at least one day a week in Atlanta. I knew my dad was dying; he needed me and I wanted to give both emotional and financial support to my mother, brother and sister as well.

"It was tough to think only of football for such a long time ... My dad was too young to die but at least he got what he wanted near the end. All the people that loved him were with him at the end of his life.

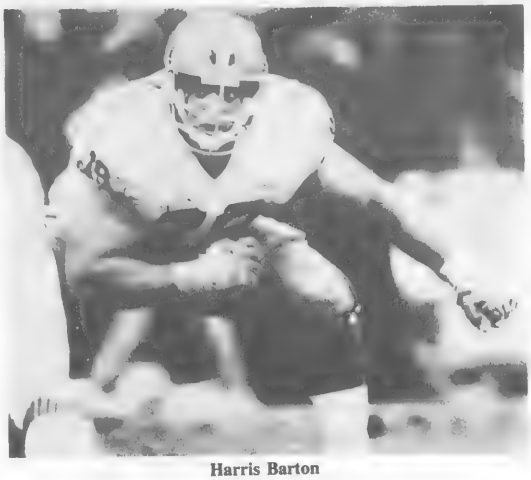
"I dedicate this season and the Super Bowl victory to my dad," Barton said. "It was his love that helped me focus on playing as well as I have all season."

Barton has been a stalwart, not only to his family, but to the 49ers as well since they drafted him as a linebacker in 1986. For the past eight years, the 6 foot 5 linebacker has developed into one of the finest offensive tackles in the National Football League. Much of the glory of the 49ers' past Super Bowl titles has gone to quarterbacks Joe Montana and Steve Young. However, Barton was instrumental in giving Montana and Young the time in the pocket to perform their magic.

"Harris excels in all facets of run and pass blocking, being quick to adapt to new plays that are called in the huddle. Believe me, without the help of Harris and the other linemen, I might never have had the time I needed to complete all my passes," said Young, named Super Bowl MVP.

Barton has earned recognition for his abilities by being named a starter in the 1994 Pro Bowl game and being selected to the NFL All-Pro team in 1992 and '93. As a college player at the University of North Carolina, Barton was chosen for various All-American teams in 1985 and '86 as well.

Known in the past as the team's worry-wart, Barton said two things changed his outlook this year. "My father's death made me realize that worrying about my own injuries or missing a tackle is not worth losing too much sleep. The second was the attitude that Deion Sanders had about playing football. Deion said you had to have fun while you were winning games. It started to sink in that football will always be a serious business, but not a life and death struggle."



Harris Barton

His new, upbeat approach helped him perform at peak levels this past season. He was superb at right tackle throughout the 49ers' playoff run, especially in the NFC title game against Dallas when he kept the Cowboys' Tony Tolbert and Jim Jeffcoat from registering a single sack.

Those close to Barton say his sense of humor and pride in being the only Jew on the team (and one of the few in the league) kept the team in the right frame of mind.

"I always worried about performing well but it didn't mean that I couldn't laugh. When another Jewish player (former tight end John Frank) played for the 49ers, we always were working on ways to get the guys in a good frame of mind.

"We brought in a method to unsettle the opposition. When Montana called signals, we taught him to count numbers in [Yiddish]. It threw off the defensive line to hear 'eins, tzvei' instead of hut-hut.

"Another time John and I were chanting Hebrew blessings during our annual Thanksgiving dinner. The guys on the team were all touched by our affirmation of our faith. An important concept of our 49er team is that we are distinct individuals who are molded together into one unit. It didn't matter this year that my roommate on the road was Young, a Mormon. We repect each other, laugh with each other and play the best football in the world."

Barton, 30, attended afternoon Jewish school while excelling in basketball, wrestling and football in high school in Atlanta. During the season, he volunteers to speak at San Francisco-area synagogues and other Jewish organizations.

"I'm very proud to be getting awards all the time from Jewish groups because being a pro football player who is also Jewish is, well, an odd animal. I mean, when I go to synagogue, people can't help but stare at a guy who comes up to the Torah and is six-foot-five, weighing 280 lbs," Barton laughed.

Immigrants graduate from JIAS

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As it was, the room was full to bursting, but if Mary Clancy had her way, the recent graduation for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services' (JIAS) English as a Second Language classes would have been even more crowded.

"I'd like to go out and get all the critics of immigration and show them this and all the groups like this who make this country strong, free, and an incredible mosaic of cultures, beliefs and tolerance," said the Halifax MP and parliamentary secretary to the minister of citizenship & immigration.

"Newcomers to Canada come with a dream for the future. Learning a new language is a key to success but also a key to taking part in all Canada has to offer," Clancy said.

JIAS set up the ESL program six years ago to help recent Soviet Jewish immigrants. It has served new immigrants from Argentina, Bosnia, Ethiopia, Hungary, Iran and Israel.

In addition to the 15 English classes, the program offers support and lessons in Jewish heritage to over 600 students.

Federation thanked

"Five months ago we knew no English," said Igor Karatigan, representing his first-level English class. "Today we can understand, read, write and speak a little English. We feel comfortable using English in our neighborhood."

Representatives of the 10 graduating classes thanked the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the federal government and the North York Board of Education, all of which provide funding for the program.

Rafael Balkins, a student who immigrated in December, enhanced the celebrations with polished renditions of two Yiddish songs. He was accompanied by two musicians who are former students of the program. The evening concluded with music and dancing, including an energetic horah.

Speakers included Perry Romberg, executive director of JIAS Toronto, whose Russian welcome was met with enthusiastic applause; Robert Furman, chair of JIAS Toronto's regional council and an immigrant from the former Soviet Union over 20 years ago; Susan Davis, national executive director of JIAS Canada; and Mila Voihanski, social work team supervisor. ESL co-ordinator Roslynne Greenberg emceed the evening.

Secular Jewish Association marks 25th year

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Secular Jewish Association (SJA) is marking its 25th anniversary this year, still trying to counter its image as a group whose members are not really interested in Judaism.

While for some, the term secular Jewish is an oxymoron, SJA members view the faith as more of a cultural, historical and humanistic way of life, eschewing prayer, dogma and other aspects of mainstream Judaism.

And adherents are proud of their movement being fully egalitarian, pluralistic and welcoming of intermarried couples (referred to as "intercultural relationships").

The organization's silver anniversary is being marked with a number of lectures and social events, including a gala dinner last Saturday night. The keynote speaker was Roberta Feinstein, executive director of the Congress of Secular Jewish Organizations, which represents some 15,000 North American Jews.

Worldwide, the movement claims between 40,000 and 45,000 followers, even in Israel, where adherents include Knesset member Shulamit Aloni, author Amos Oz and Prof. Yehuda Bauer.

Today, the organization claims 68 member families in and around Metro, with small groups in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Montreal. A Sunday school in Toronto offers classes for 75 children in kindergarten through Grade 7. There are youth and adult education programs, leadership training, socials and discussion groups — all stressing the belief that Jewish identity is rooted in ethnicity and culture, rather than in Torah and traditional religious observance.

Also offered are bnai mitzvah, baby namings and weddings. Jewish holidays are observed — again, with the accent on their cultural and historical validity. The SJA is an affiliate of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, and takes part in community-wide programs such as Holocaust Education Week and Jewish Book Fair.

Members have also volunteered at food banks.

Judaism has "a long and rich history" of humanism and pluralism, says the SJA's madricha (leader) Eva Goldfinger, who's licensed to perform weddings in Ontario. "We deal with this world. We are open, flexible and non-authoritarian. We believe in self-determination."

In a more controversial vein, SJA members are "fundamentally agnostic. We do not pray," although Torah readings, brachot and prayers are permitted in services if they and their relevance are fully explained.

The main philosophical underpinnings of secular/humanistic Judaism, Goldfinger explains, are that the universe exists on natural laws; that human beings guide their own lives; and that only through acceptance and inclusion will Jewish identity be preserved.

The movement has its roots in the Yiddish nationalism and secular Zionism that flourished in Europe a century ago. Congregations espousing humanistic Judaism began in 1963, while the international movement gelled in 1986.

The SJA was founded in Toronto in 1969 as an outgrowth of the far-left United Jewish Peoples Order. SJA members were mainly unaffiliated, probably liberal and perhaps disenfranchised Jews who sought a non-religious outlet for their beliefs.

For information on the SJA and its calendar of anniversary programs, call 416-463-3930.

Project Renewal helps revive neglected Israeli neighborhoods

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

BEERSHEVA — In Israel's headlong rush to modernity and prosperity, it was inevitable that some of its citizens would get left behind.

In an effort to deal with the lingering socio-economic problems, Project Renewal was established in the late 1970s.

A partnership between the Israeli government, the Jewish Agency and specific Diaspora communities, Project Renewal is essentially an ambitious effort to revive decaying and neglected neighborhoods and to upgrade social and educational services.

By twinning Jewish communities abroad with Israeli neighborhoods in need of rehabilitation, the hope was that the disadvantaged would benefit.

In line with this philosophy, Montreal and Toronto Jews are participating in Project Renewal efforts in Beersheva and Eilat, respectively.

The project in Beersheva turns on Dalet Mercaz, which was once described as the "worst neighborhood" in Israel by the Israeli daily Ma'ariv.

Dalet Mercaz, with a largely Sephardi population, was rundown and overcrowded. Its schools and public facilities were considered substandard.

In a bid to turn things around, a number of projects were started, according to Beersheva's deputy mayor, Rachel Levy.

The Early Childhood Centre, which opened last April, is located in the heart of Dalet Mercaz. It provides day care and preschool services and after school enrichment programs for local children.

"It's a new concept in Israel," says its director, Chasia Levine. "It answers the needs of young families for specialized services."

In the not too distant future, the Early Childhood Centre will be supplemented by an Education Resource Centre, says Elizabeth Homans, Montreal's Project Renewal representative in Beersheva.

The Education Resource Centre will deliver enrichment courses to local teachers, but students will have access to it.

In addition, Project Renewal funds the Entrepreneurial Business Centre, or Mati, which offers loans and advice to residents who want to start small businesses. Thirty per cent of the applicants are new immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

So far, Mati has helped literally dozens of aspiring capitalists, notes Yair Cohen of the Jewish Agency.

Until last year, mentally handicapped adults in Beersheva had no services. Thanks to Montreal philantrophists Leonard and Alice Cohen, some now have access to sheltered housing in the form of the Cohen Centre (which is not officially affiliated with Project Renewal).

It funds once-a-week classes for gifted children at Eilat College for 60 students aged 11 to 15. "Our objective is to reinforce their curiosity and motivation," explains Jacob Dafni, director of marine studies.

Through Project Renewal, the college also hosts an adult education program.

In conjunction with the Ministry of Housing, the playground at the Arava School has been renovated and a security fence built around it. As well, the school library has been upgraded.

A science teaching centre, funded in part by the Hebrew University and the Ministry of Education, is due to be inaugurated in 1996.

Guess who? Former campers from White Pine will gather this year for a 40th anniversary celebration.

Camp White Pine marks 40 years

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Joe Kronick has been going to summer camp since 1932: the founder and director of Camp White Pine was so hooked, he made a career out of it.

The camp will hold a 40th anniversary staff reunion on the Labor Day weekend. Anyone who has ever worked at the camp is invited.

Organizers of the event — a steering committee of 40 former and current staff members — have sent out 2,000 invitations and are trying to track more people down. Invitations have been sent to Sweden and Tasmania.

Kronick's son Adam, who co-directs the camp with his father, told The CJN that many nostalgic staffers requested an overnight reunion "to relive some of their memories."

'Ultimate experience'

Camp is the greatest single experience you can have, Joe Kronick told The CJN. "Being in the outdoors away from parents; being with kids your own age. This is the ultimate experience."

Camp is the best social education for children because group living helps them develop peer relationships, he said. "[Camp] is where you make friendships."

Kornick said he still keeps in touch with some of the people he went to camp with as a youngster. His first camp experience was in Palestine. His father, an ardent Zionist, enroled Kronick and his sister in a camp near Haifa.

Back in North America he attended Camp Modin in Maine. During his teen years he worked at Camp Hag Shama, Camp Northland-B'nai Brith and Pittsburgh's Laurel Y Camp.

After completing a master's of social work degree at the University of Pittsburgh in 1950, Kronick became director of Camp Laurel Y. In 1952 he directed Camp B'nai Brith in Manitoba, returning to Toronto the following year to run Camp Northland.

Two years later, he went into private camping. "I wanted to be my own boss," he said. In 1956 Kronick set up Camp White Pine in an old fishing lodge on the 465-acre property he had purchased near Haliburton. Today the camp occupies 1,600 acres.

The first year 165 children enrolled in the camp. Registration more than doubled by the fourth year, and by the fifth year the camp was full with 380 campers.

The camp has maintained this level of registration — 380 to 400 campers — for the last 15 years, employing a total of 190 staff.

While most of the people at camp are from Toronto, Kronick has recruited campers from Montreal, the United States, Mexico, Hong Kong, Israel, Sweden and France. The camp is predominantly Jewish, offering Oneg Shabat programs and kosher food for those who want it.

For more information on the reunion, call Joe or Adam Kronick at 416-322-6250.

Shas refuses to rejoin coalition government

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Orthodox Shas party has announced it will not rejoin the governing coalition of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

In a letter explaining the decision, Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef cited Israel's deteriorating security situation as the reason.

"We had always aspired to peace, even in return for painful concessions," Rabbi Yosef wrote. "But the security situation now is insufferable.

"This is not the peace for which we prayed."

Shas political leader and former interior minister Aryeh Deri said his party's move did not mean it would automatically vote with the opposition.

Shas left the coalition more than a year ago when Deri was indicted on charges of fraud, bribery and breach of public trust. He is currently on trial.

Since then, Shas has neither joined the opposition nor returned to the government fold.

The party has usually supported the government in crucial votes, particularly those relating to the peace process or when no-confidence motions have been brought before the Knesset.

Rabin is expected to reassign the two ministerial portfolios held aside for Shas.

The religious affairs and interior ministry portfolios are expected to go to ministers who would act as caretakers — a move that would leave the door open for future negotiations between Labor and Shas.

Shas' decision came hours before Israel's High Court of Justice handed down a ruling on a controversial agreement Rabin made with Shas last year as part of the effort to get it to rejoin the Labor-led coalition.

A special panel of five justices criticized the agreement, calling it legal but highly improper. But the court decided not to intervene in the matter, saying it should be determined in the political arena, not in the courtroom.

The judges had criticized a clause in the agreement stating that if the religious status quo were violated — by a court ruling, for example — legislation would be enacted to restore it, thus overriding the courts. One of Shas' conditions for rejoining the coalition had been a guarantee the status quo would prevail on religious issues.

The justices said the wording of the clause made it appear the government would, through use of legislation, automatically reverse any court rulings affecting religious matters.

Helms advocates end to Israeli aid

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Conservative Republican Senator Jesse Helms has again drawn the ire of some Capitol Hill colleagues for advocating an end to Israel's foreign aid.

In an interview with The Hill, a weekly newspaper that covers Congress, Helms said "there's been a lot of moaning and groaning about money sent to Israel. I myself have been very candid to Jewish leaders that I'd like to cut out foreign aid to them."

Helms called foreign aid "insanity."

As chairman of the Senate's powerful Foreign Relations Committee, Helms will play a significant role in shaping American foreign aid. His committee determines the distribution of U.S. foreign assistance.

"I'd like to cut it all out and just revisit the whole issue in terms of what is best for the American people," said Helms in the interview.

Rep. Jerrold Nadler (D — N.Y.) immediately defended Israel's $3 billion in annual U.S. aid in a letter to the senator.

Your statements "suggest a deep misunderstanding of the importance of the U.S.-Israel relationship and the critical role foreign aid continues to play in promoting stability and peace in the region," Nadler wrote.

In the interview, Helms reiterated his plan to link foreign aid to how much it would cost America to defend its interests.

Sen. Jesse Helms

Citing as an example the role the United States could play in the Middle East without Israel, he said, "I would much prefer a system that would assess how much it would cost the American taxpayers to finance a defence of our interests in that part of the world if there were no Israel."

Analysts estimated that Israel's role in containing Iran and Iraq — one of Israel's primary strategic roles as a U.S. ally — saves the United States over $100 billion a year.

Thus, Helms' plan would cost taxpayers "exponentially" more than they pay now, according to the analysts.

Peres goes to bat

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres ventured into unchartered peacemaking territory last week: American baseball.

When an overzealous reporter confused Peres for a member of the baseball strike negotiating team and asked him about the status of the bargaining sessions, the Israeli leader joked with reporters who had surrounded him, "We will get an interim agreement. It will be a handshake."

A model wearing the offensive pajamas

Japanese designer withdraws collection

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — A Japanese fashion designer has decided to take a line of men's striped pajamas off the market after outraged Jewish officials charged the clothing resembled Nazi concentration camp uniforms.

Leaders of the European Jewish Congress said Rei Kawakubo, the designer and president of Comme des Garcons, had trivialized the Holocaust by including the striped pajamas in a show held here on the same day the world was marking the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp.

Following the protest, Comme des Garcons issued a release last week, saying: "Rei Kawakubo has decided, as a measure of respect to those people who have been shocked, to withdraw from the collection the striped pajamas in question as well as all other clothes made with the same fabric."

The Jan. 27 show featured several striped types of pajamas, including one pair modeled by an emaciated model with closely cropped hair and protruding ears. Some jackets had boot marks and numbers painted on them.

The EJC called the show "deeply disturbing" and said the appearance of an emaciated model in a striped outfit was "particularly shocking."

Kawakubo had said in an earlier statement that the theme of the collection was relaxation and sleep, and that she never meant to make reference to the concentration camps.

"The fact that it was so completely misunderstood has caught me by surprise and made me very sad," she said. "Personally, I have always deeply respected the Jewish people and felt close to them in my heart."

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial here has rejected a request by a group of Orthodox Jews to remove photographs showing victims of the Holocaust going to their deaths naked.

Avner Shalev, the administrative chairman of Yad Vashem, said the institution had a duty to portray history as it happened.

"The pictures show how millions of Holocaust victims were taken to their deaths," Shalev said. "We have no reason or authority to cover the terrible truth or make it more attractive. We have to present it the way it was."

He said he dismissed a threat from a Jerusalem municipality official, Chaim Miller, who called for a boycott of Yad Vashem.

Miller, who heads the Association for Rights of the Haredi Public, a group representing the ultra-Orthodox, said that after "a letter is sent forbidding visits to Yad Vashem, I believe it will reconsider its irresponsible decision."

According to Miller, "Halachah forbids displays of nakedness. It is a humiliation and insult to Yad Vashem to show people who died [this way]. The Holocaust does not need nudity to make it more shocking."

He added that those who refuse to consider his group's request are turning the issue into a debate between religious and secular Jews.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 6:

• Foreign Minister Shimon Peres met with the UN Security Council to apprise members, as well as those from Arab states, on the status of the peace process.

• In an unprecedented move, the City of Jerusalem compensated Arab merchants whose stores were damaged by Jewish protesters during last summer's demonstrations against PLO leader Yasser Arafat. The city gave three merchants a total of $15,000.

Feb. 7:

• In 1994, 24 men were granted permission by Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi Doron to take second wives. Yediot Achronot reported that in most of those cases, the women were mentally ill and in others, they were out of the country and could not be reached.

• Yasser Arafat would easily win if elections were held today in the Gaza Strip and Jericho, said the head of Israel's military intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Uri Saguy.

• Palestinian police in Gaza verified a report that an 18-year-old youth arrested three weeks ago had planned a suicide attack against Israel and had already videotaped a farewell speech to his family. The youth was released by police six days after his arrest when he promised not to go ahead with the plan.

Feb. 8:

• Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan announced he will run for prime minister in 1996. Eitan's platform calls for the annexation of the Jordan Valley and the southern Hebron Hills.

• Leaders of three Jewish settlements in Gaza prevented work from starting on an electric fence that would separate Israelis and Palestinians, arguing it would leave the settlements, with their 250 families, inside the Palestinian autonomous zone.

Feb. 9:

• Israel transferred some agricultural land in the Jordan Valley to Jordan. Under the countries' peace accord, Israel will lease the land back and Israeli farmers will continue to work it.

Feb. 10:

• In Jerusalem, a Kach activist was arrested carrying two home-made bombs police said he planned to use against Arabs in eastern Jerusalem.

Pollard play provokes Israeli audiences

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — American Jewry did nothing to stop the Holocaust.

Israel is a danger to the Jewish people.

The "partnership" between Israel and Diaspora Jewry is a farce.

These are just a few of the accusations made in Pollard, a provocative new play that opened in Tel Aviv this month to packed houses.

The fictional account does more than reconstruct the circumstances that led to the arrest of Jonathan Pollard, the American Jew serving a life sentence for passing classified documents to Israel. The play goads Israelis into examining their own consciences, forcing them to question not only Israel's handling of the Pollard affair, but other issues like Israel's smug attitude towards Diaspora Jewry, and the very meaning of Jewish identity.

"We are here not to blame or to justify, but to soul-search," says one of the characters.

Why do we need soul-searching?

"Because we have buried many of the issues raised by the Pollard affair," says playwright Motti Lerner, 46, whose own conscience was shaken during his visits to the United States in the last two years.

"I found that in every conversation with American Jews concerning Israel-Diaspora relations the Pollard affair came up. Yet in Israel, it is rarely discussed ... Most Israelis, including myself, dismissed it as an incident of little interest or importance."

One of the sharpest attacks in the play is directed at Israel for its failure to assume responsibility for the fate of Pollard after he has given the country valuable information. The play attempts to raise Israeli awareness and generate public support for Pollard. The audience is even urged to sign a petition demanding his release.

But Lerner also pokes mercilessly at some of Israelis' most cherished assumptions.

"You know the United States is a better place for Jews than Israel is," says Sam Goldstein, the fictitious American uncle of Ann Pollard in the play.

"Not true!" shouts someone in the audience to wild applause.

But Goldstein is just warming up. "Oh yes it is," he retorts. "America is stronger than Israel, our Jewish community is bigger — and it's more Jewish than yours!" The audience groans. "Where do you have more yeshivot?" he asks. "In Brooklyn or in B'nai Brak? "

Goldstein — a plump, UJA-supporting New Yorker — is an outlet for Lerner's own disturbing questions about Israel and Jewish identity. While visiting Jewish communities in the United States, the playwright did some soul-searching of his own.

" 'Why is it that in all Israeli drama and literature there is not a single American Jewish character?' I asked myself. You'll find European Jews and Oriental ones, but not a single American — even though this community represents almost half of world Jewry."

Lerner's answer? "I think it is an act of self-defence on the part of Israeli Jews. Until I saw the vibrant cultural life of American Jewry, I was convinced — as most Israelis are — that Israel is the world centre of Judaism. But American Jewry presents a convincing alternative — and this is a real threat to Israeli Jews since it puts their own identity into question."

Even Israel's raison d'etre — to provide a safe haven for Jews — is challenged in the play.

"You want us all to come to live in Israel?" Goldstein asks his Israeli audience. "And once we all make aliyah what will happen then? We will be eight million Jews living in this tiny spot surrounded by hundreds of millions of hostile Arabs. All it takes is one Islamic nuclear bomb and that's the end of us. Israel is a danger to the Jewish people!"

But the Diaspora is not spared. "When a Jew wins a Nobel Prize, we swell with pride. But if one of ours does something wrong then we each crawl off to hide under our individual rocks," says Goldstein.

"One question posed by the Pollard affair is the extent to which American Jews are obligated towards Israel," says Lerner, who recalls his own sense of disappointment in American Jewry in the tense days preceding the Six Day War. "I was 18. I remember my fear at the time. There was a real sense that Israel's existence was in doubt. Why didn't the United States use its veto [in the UN Security Council] to prevent UN peacekeeping forces from leaving Sinai at Egypt's request? Where was the American Jewish community? Aside from a few demonstrations what did they do? For me this was a repeat of what happened in the Holocaust when American Jews did almost nothing."

The Pollard affair never sparked a passionate public discussion in Israel. Through Pollard, Lerner hopes to change that.

Fact or fiction?

"I'd like to believe that by generating support this play can be of some service to Jonathan Pollard," says director Ilan Ronen.

But not everyone believes it will be. "I don't think the play should have been presented now," says Amnon Dror, head of the Israel Committee for the Release of of Pollard. In November, Pollard will have served 10 years of his life sentence and be eligible to request an early release from a parole board. "I think the theatre should have waited until after that to stage the play," says Dror.

Lerner insists the piece will not hurt Pollard. He took many poetic liberties in portraying Pollard, but was careful to emphasize two points: that Pollard was motivated by idealism alone, and that he was diligent about not giving away any information that could harm the United States.

Manning: government divides

Manning says he "couldn't care less" if CSIS was investigating Reform "because we have nothing to hide," but he is worried a far more serious breach of civil liberties may have taken place.

The inquiry into the matter was incomplete, he charged, because the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), the watchdog of CSIS, is composed of "unsympathetic" Conservative, Liberals and New Democrats.

Manning insisted Reform is not anti-immigration or anti-multiculturalism. "Our basic philosophy is total racial and ethnic neutrality in any goverment policy or constitutional matter. Race or ethnicity should not be a factor in immigration status."

Manning does propose that immigration be tied to Canada's economic conditions and "absorption capacity." Currently, he thinks the annual immigration level should be lowered to 150,000 because of high unemployment and "our social services are falling apart." (Refugee selection should remain independent of such considerations, he added).

"We are pro-immigration...99 per cent of our members in the West wouldn't be there if it hadn't been for immigration programs," he said.

As for multiculturalism, Manning is firm that the federal government should "get out of the business of handing out grants for the preservation and development of cultural distinction.

"That should be the responsibility of individuals, private associations and lower levels of government, including the provinces.'

Ottawa's role in the multiculturalism arena should be limited to combatting discrimination and helping immigrants resettle, and these functions could be handled by the justice and immigration departments, respectively, he stated.

Manning said keeping the federal government out of funding ethnic groups is a matter of principle, more than money. "The role of the federal government is to protect the right of cultural distinction, not to promote it...It should be a referee, not a player."

Federal funding has caused divisiveness between ethnic groups, who are jealous of what another community received, Manning suggested. The money has also at times been used to buy the votes of certain communities, he asserted. "Such crass political manipulation cheapens the whole thing."

If all citizens are to be truly equal, Manning believes the constitution should not make any reference to "two founding peoples."

"It's implicit that if you are English or French you have more entitlements...Being from one of the founding nations ought not to be relevant."

Preston Manning

Manning says his politics are guided by a strong Christian faith. On difficult ethical issues he has drawn up a procedure aimed at finding a compromise — if necessary — between the views of his MPs and their constituents.

Should physician-assisted suicide, for example, come to a vote in the House of Commons, Manning has instructed his MPs to first determine if a consensus exists among the citizens of the riding and to vote accordingly. If there is no consensus, Manning will free the caucus to vote according to personal conscience.

Manning is confident that he has allayed the concerns of most Jews in Western Canada about his party, and is even gaining some support. His own riding of Calgary South West has a significant Jewish population, and the Levant family have become active members of the party.

Ministers' meeting encourages trade

Israel's decision to seal the territories, preventing the entry of tens of thousands of Palestinian workers, has prompted protests from the Palestinians, who say the move only fuels those opposed to peace.

Relations with Egypt have also been strained in recent weeks, with Cairo threatening to withdraw from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty unless Israel signs the global pact.

Prior to the full summit Sunday afternoon, officials from Israel, Egypt and the United States met privately. Peres said Israel also resisted Egyptian demands to address the question of Israel's nuclear capability. Israel reaffirmed its pledge not to sign the treaty, Peres told reporters.

"Parties shall pursue a mutually verifiable Middle East zone free of weapons of mass destruction," according to the joint communique.

In his meeting with the Israeli, Egyptian, Jordanian and Palestinian leaders, Clinton called for cooperation to bring the economic benefits of peace to the people of the Middle East.

As an example of American support, he said he would ask Congress to allow into the United States duty-free imports from proposed economic free-trade zones in Jordan and Egypt as well as from Palestinian-controlled areas of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"In the end the economic and political cooperation among all of you will be the most important thing in reaping economic progress," Clinton said.

In a separate meeting with Christopher, the Israelis and Palestinians agreed to build six industrial parks on the borders between the territories and Israel, Peres told reporters.

Peres said such U.S.-supported economic developments were much appreciated.

Asked whether these industrial parks negated the notion of a separation between Israel and the Palestinians, Peres said, "You can separate people, but not economies."

"We are at a critical moment in the peace process," Clinton stated. He pledged to "redouble our efforts to get the peace process back in full gear."

He called on the parties to work out their security differences in order to move the process forward.

LifeStyle

PKNS: Partners in your Financial Future

With all the complications of life in the 90's, you likely have little time to consider your long-term financial goals, such as how to save money for retirement, your children's education and the eventual capital gains taxes on your estate.

With the stakes so high it is crucial to take the time to think about your future, your long term goals and what you'll have to do to achieve them.

THE MOST IMPORTANT DECISION IS: who you will choose as your financial advisors to help you achieve STRONG, STEADY FINANCIAL GROWTH over time. One firm, which specializes in servicing the needs of Toronto's Jewish Community is trusted by hundreds of clients for their personal service, professional conservative advice and creative tax reduction strategies.

Servicing the needs of Toronto's Jewish Community

Nathan Disenhouse, Zale Newman and Ken Stern are the senior partners of PKNS Insurance & Financial Services, one of Toronto's fastest growing personal financial services firms. They work closely with their clients to set long-term financial goals and an achievable plan to reach them.

To set financial goals your advisors will help you establish your net worth, that is the difference between your assets and your liabilities. Your assets should include cash savings, stocks and bonds, the cashable portions of life-insurance policies, cars, RRSP's and, the equity in any property or businesses.

Your PKNS advisors will factor in cash reserves – equal to about three months' worth of your income to cover short term emergencies, including loss of employment, and short term disability, and they will discuss your plans in the event of a serious illness or death.

If there isn't very much, the PKNS financial advisors will seek ways to make your assets more productive.

The most important questions to ask yourself are: "What kind of lifestyle do you want to have when you retire?", and "Will you have enough capital to fulfill your dreams?"

A PKNS Partner will advise you as to how much you'll need to save to support your long-term goals and will suggest ways in which you can better realize them. This will include innovative tax reduction strategies and investment advice suited to fit your personal objectives.

The partners of PKNS WORK FOR YOU, NOT FOR A PARTICULAR FINANCIAL COMPANY. They represent virtually every major financial & insurance company in Canada. They measure the performance of various financial services companies and design a financial strategy JUST FOR YOU. The key is to fit your personal goals and needs. They cut through the confusion and work closely to educate you as to why you should follow a particular plan.

Aside from cash reserves, an investment plan today will likely include a mutual fund recommendation. Mutual funds are an attractive option because they are liquid, diversified and managed professionally.

Long term peak performers include Fidelity Investments, North America's most popular family of funds as well as Dynamic, Global Strategy, C.I., Trimark, Mackenzie and Elliott & Page.

Today many people wish to diversify their RRSPs to take advantage of investments outside of Canada, but still maintain the security of bond investments.

One fund that PKNS recommends is the FIDELITY RSP GLOBAL BOND FUND which invests in the foreign currency bonds of Canadian Governments and Corporations. This allows you to take advantage of stronger foreign currencies, while achieving the security of safe bond investments.

Some investment vehicles can provide you with numerous tax advantages while others provide access to U.S. or foreign markets and many provide secure, guaranteed returns.

Zale Newman, Nathan Disenhouse, Ken Stern

As part of a total personalized approach, PKNS provides more than 50 years of experience in personalized Estate Planning, Life & Disability insurance, and innovative tax reduction strategies.

Many innovative, creative planning approaches

Here too, the partners of PKNS and their associated company, Panfinancial, WORK FOR YOU, NOT ANY PARTICULAR INSURANCE COMPANY. They provide Life & Disability insurance planning in U.S. or Canadian Dollars, insurance payable in PRE-TAX dollars and their unique "Unlimited RRSP" amongst their many, creative planning approaches.

Choosing the partners of PKNS to help you set and achieve your financial goals is THE MOST IMPORTANT FINANCIAL DECISION YOU CAN MAKE. Hundreds of clients in the Toronto Jewish Community rest more easily knowing they are well on their way to achieving their financial goals with the continued assistance of PKNS.

As Canadians shudder in the face of rising taxes, huge government deficits, rising interest rates and a falling dollar, your soundest financial strategy is to have the partners of PKNS become PARTNERS IN YOUR FINANCIAL FUTURE.

If you have a minimum of $50,000 in RRSP or investment funds call:

Nathan Disenhouse, Zale Newman or Ken Stern at (416) 499-1995 for an appointment.

BioBeam from Israel - The Healing Beam of Light

Two revolutionary new products from Israel are now available for the first time in Canada!

Thousands of people in Israel, Europe, South Africa, South America, the Far East and Australia have been successfully using BIOBEAM LIGHT TREATMENT SYSTEMS since 1992 to successfully treat and alleviate pain associated with rheumatological diseases and wound healing.

A Toronto based company, Avroom Medical has secured the Canadian distribution rights for this amazing, proven product that's manufactured in Holon, Israel by Amcor, Israel's leading appliance manufacturer. The company's principals, Howard Tishman and Jack Harrison, plan to launch this product through a distributor network and an extensive advertising program across Canada.

The secret behind BioBeam's effectiveness lies in the type of light it emits. The light is concentrated around a particular wavelength, which stimulates a beneficial natural healing effect at the cellular level. These therapeutic "waves of light" accelerate healing, and provide relief from pain associated with inflammation. This light is known as "soft" or "cold" lasers, and is used throughout the world by the medical profession in treating many ailments.

The BioBeam 940 is used to alleviate rheumatic and rheumatoid arthritis pains, joint problems in the fingers hand and knees and connective tissue disorders.

The second product, BioBeam 660, has proven extremely effective for treating acne, cold sores (herpes), bed sores (decubitus ulcers), and skin ulcers associated with diabetes as well as speeding up the healing process of post-operative wounds.

A professional model that's larger and more powerful is available for Physiotherapists, Chiropractors and others in the medical professions.

Safe & easy to use

The BIOBEAM LIGHT SYSTEM is safe, easy to use, easily portable so you can use it at home, or anywhere. You can try it on a "no-risk" basis for 45 days. Its proven results (making use of the body's natural healing system) have resulted in the tremendous acceptance of the BIOBEAM LIGHT SYSTEMS around the world.

For more information or to order the BIOBEAM 940, or the BIOBEAM 660 LIGHT SYSTEM, please contact Avroom Medical, 3200 Dufferin Street, Suite 205, North York, Ontario, M6A 2T3 or call toll free 1-800-324-8181.

Party Planning Show at Bayview Village

There are 80 stores at Bayview Village Shopping Centre — enough to offer variety, yet make one-stop shopping easy. "Our Shopping Centre is small and friendly, like a village," says Marketing Director Anna-Marie Kelly: "we want to keep it that way". One example: each restaurant has its own seating so shoppers can relax.

Bayview Village is a busy place, with "something going on every week", says Kelly. For anyone planning a celebration, Bayview Village hosts the Party Planning Show from Thursday, February 23 to Sunday, February 26, with exhibitors from inside and outside the Centre.

Inside exhibitors include Van Bassen Flowers, with bouquets and displays for all occasions; Capelli Hair Stylists, presenting a complete beauty showcase; Max's Catering; Collacutt Travel for the grand tour or weekend getaway; A La Card Custom Invitations; and Rob McIntosh China, which has a bridal and gift registry.

Bayview Village's unique fashion stores will all take part in the Show: Camari, Calèche, Chadwicks and Your Choice for women's fashions, including evening wear; Sinardi and Barbuti for men's wear; and Maison Vali for children's dress-up.

Bayview Village also welcomes two new tenants:

David Wood Food Shop. Enjoy Spring Bounty, the freshest tastes and the latest arrivals, as David Wood welcomes spring with uniquely prepared cakes and pastries, Catering Service, Gift Baskets and Signature Private Label products. Here, the best quality and service come as naturally as spring. Call 222-0345.

Fleuri, the Village's newest arrival, is an exclusive cosmetic and fragrance boutique specializing in brand names (Estée Lauder, Shiseido, Lancôme, Chanel, Guerlain, and Yves St-Laurent) with friendly personalized service.

Survey Says... Singles Registry Number One

A recent survey of Jewish dating services in Toronto revealed that the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto is number one in terms of number of members. In just two short years J.S.R. has soared to the top of the list with membership fast approaching the 650 member mark. Torontonians are now realizing that J.S.R. is the fastest, easiest, least threatening and most confidential way for Jewish singles to meet.

J.S.R. is happy to report that two more couples will be tying the knot later on this year, and at least 33 other couples are dating steady. "Business is booming," beamed a proud J.S.R. director Rob Singer from his desk in Toronto. "We have come a long way in a short period of time, and the future looks great. Much of our membership comes from referrals from other members, a positive sign that members are happy with the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto.

The simplicity of the concept seems to be the major drawing card of the J.S.R. by giving as much information on a particular person as possible in an organized precise and confidential manner. Registry members get to review hundreds of files of Jewish singles (including photographs) and take a proactive approach by choosing for themselves whom they would like to meet. There's no matchmaking here! The person selected is then called in to see who chose them and if the feeling is mutual, phone numbers are given out right on the spot.

If there is one thing that stands out in this entire process it is the fact that everyone at the Jewish Singles Registry is equal and has the same opportunities as the next person. Whether someone is dynamic and outgoing, or quiet and laid back, the selection process puts everybody on the same pedestal. Members can go on as many or as few dates as they wish (providing both parties said yes) and with numbers on the rise there are always new and exciting members to view. According to their statistics members average between 12 to 24 dates in a given year.

Very affordable

J.S.R. is a service like no other. It is honest, straight forward and very affordable. Best of all there are no surprises and because you do the choosing, what you get is what you see! If you are looking to meet other Jewish singles, be it for friendship, a relationship, or even marriage, now is the perfect time to join and be a part of Toronto's largest Jewish dating service.

For more information or to become a member please call 416-398-7068.

Basque on Bay

For the partners who own Basque on Bay, there are no customers, only guests. They want their guests to make themselves at home, relax in the big, comfortable chairs, and take time to enjoy their meal.

Partners Michael Weger and Chef Michael Punzo have worked together for 10 years. Chef Punzo, who has worked at some of Toronto's finest restaurants, is determined to establish Basque on Bay as one of the top restaurants in the city.

Although Basque on Bay has been open only five months, its reputation is building a regular clientele. Lunch regulars from the business and academic community are starting to return with their spouses in the evening.

The atmosphere is relaxing, with earth tones, bright, airy rooms, large windows, and fresh flowers every day. Service is friendly and courteous, yet professional, with the staff formally dressed in white shirts and ties.

At Basque on Bay, the emphasis is on fresh market cuisine with a California flair, cooked in natural sauces. Each plate is prepared individually, as a work of art for the eye as well as the palate. This applies both to the main courses and to the home-made desserts, which are changed daily. Aroma and texture are also important; the staff strive to entrance all the senses with their creations.

Prices are very reasonable. Among the appetizers, baked eggplant with goat cheese and roasted red peppers in a tomato coulis is $7. Main dishes include: grilled swordfish with curried lentils, asparagus, eggplant and crisp fried leeks for $15; grilled tiger shrimp on sundried tomato risotto served with a jiama mango vidalia salsa for $18.75; and grilled black angus steak with peppered cabernet jus, potato crisps, horseradish aioli and a medley of vegetables for $15.25. From among the pastas, one can sample spaghettini with sauteed shrimp, arugula, and artichoke hearts in a herb cream sauce for $12.75.

In the lounge, there is a tapas menu; these tasty appetizers are five or six dollars each, but priced two for one between 4:00 and 7:00 p.m. Lunch is served from Monday to Friday. There are daily specials, and a daily promotion in the bar.

Evenings, guests can hear Julio play the piano in the lounge, and sing everything from old movie standards to love ballads.

Basque on Bay's private function rooms can host from 20 to 70 people, whether for meetings or celebrations like weddings and bar mitzvahs. Guests can, if they wish, meet in one room and dine in another.

Basque on Bay is at 1121 Bay St. at Charles, just south of Bloor. For reservations, please call 968-0736.

Columnist's book offers sound financial advice

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Despite the profusion of personal finance books, many authors have been slow to recognize that the traditional family, supported by dad, is nearly extinct.

A recently published guide written by Globe and Mail columnist Ellen Roseman is geared to contemporary families in all their diversity — double income families, couples living in common-law unions, single parent households and same-sex couples.

She wrote the book last year during the Year of the Family. "It was a wonderful year for re-examining the definition of family," she said.

Ellen Roseman's Money Guide for Modern Families (Doubleday Canada, $16.95), aimed at 35- to 50-year olds, covers a lot of ground, from marriage contracts and co-habitation agreements to teaching children how to manage money. The guide offers advice on separation, divorce, remarriage, insurance, writing a will, taking care of elderly parents and saving for a child's education.

As far as Roseman knows, it is the first personal finance book to address same-sex couples, who are usually childless and more affluent than people with children. While researching the book, she talked to financial planners who told her a good portion of their clients were same-sex couples.

Roseman, 47, is married with two young sons. But she and her husband of 20 years, Edward Trapunski, have an untraditional family. A freelance journalist, Trapunski works from home and runs the household during the day. As his income varies, the family relies on Roseman's earnings from her full-time job at the Globe to pay the mortgage.

With her investment knowledge, she takes care of the family's investments, traditionally a man's role. "I do run into a lot more women who are doing investing for their family," she said. "Women have learned more about investing and take primary responsibility for it."

She hopes women will read her guide to personal finance, which is clearly written and free of technical language. "Often they are turned off by technical jargon," she said.

One chapter of Roseman's guide is devoted to teaching children about money, which includes investing.

She suggests that parents, or grandparents, acquire stocks of companies such as Disney, Coca-Cola, Toys "R" Us, Irwin Toys or McDonald's for children. Investors in Walt Disney Co. get 10 to 30 per cent discounts on Disney resorts and hotels, while Irwin Toys' annual meeting includes the chance to test new toys. Roseman stresses, however, that some stocks "with kid appeal" pay no dividends, while others have experienced steep price declines in the past.

To avoid hefty commission charges on a small purchase, Roseman directs buyers to a discount brokerage or to the annual financial forum held in Toronto each February, where a dozen companies sell up to 10 of their shares for a $10.50 commission.

Mutual funds are another popular investment for children. Roseman invested money for her 13-year-old son, Charles, into four mutual funds last year and to her son's distress, three of them went down.

"He couldn't stand it," said Roseman. "He said to me, 'Get me out of there, I hate it.' " She moved the money into another fund and the price went down again. "When you mention mutual funds to him today, he's still not happy."

Roseman said it is difficult for many adults to accept risk and even more so for children. "You only build up tolerance to risk after investing for a while."

In the guide, she says children can learn about saving early by putting aside 10 per cent of their weekly allowances, and can learn about charitable giving by setting aside another 10 per cent for the charity of their choice. "Like saving, this is as good habit for parents to instill in kids at a young age."

Roseman, who graduated from McGill with an master's degree in philosophy, has worked for the Financial Post and the Toronto Star. She is currently the associate managing editor responsible for investment coverage at the Globe.

Her tip for people who get investment advice from newspapers is to take it with a grain of salt. "Never base investment plans on what you see in one day's newspaper," she said, since the business press has a short-term outlook and the situation could easily change tomorrow.

New plan rewards deficit-reducing ideas

By JOSEPH SERGE
CJN Business Editor

TORONTO — A new, non-profit plan to reward government workers for their ideas to reduce Canada's financial deficit and promote economic growth has been announced.

The Canadian Involvement Plan for Government Employees (CIPGE) is the brainchild of David Satok, president of the Loyal Group Inc. investment firm and an officer with Canadian Jewish Congress.

Satok said he wants to see all levels of government run with business efficiency. "If the governments apply the same reward systems as private enterprise, we would see much better results," he believes.

CIPGE will reward government employees for ideas which use sound business principles to save money, eliminate waste and benefit the people of Canada.

The awards are substantial. Major awards of $100,000 and $50,000 will be given to the best suggestions each year, along with 10 prizes of up to $5,000.

Funding will come solely from major corporations and fundraising.

"CIPGE is prepared to tap Canadian ingenuity and reward people who want to take the time to make a difference. It gives grassroots workers, moderates, thinkers and big-picture planners a real chance to make a difference and tackle the national debt," Satok said.

Entries are confidential, and submissions can be made through third parties.

The competition is open to civil servants at all levels of government, including retired employees and those working in government-funded organizations like universities and hospitals. Also eligible are contracted consultants who "can re-examine their reports which are now sitting on dusty shelves," Satok said.

Written submissions will be reviewed by representatives from business, labor and academia.

Satok, who is expecting the competition to receive "a huge amount" of submissions, said CIPGE will help ensure winning recommendations are implemented quickly.

"If a suggestion with potential for cost containment is being ignored without explanation, I see no reason why the public — the people ultimately footing the bill — shouldn't be informed," Satok said.

"If we can save two per cent per annum, governments could balance the budgets in 10 years and start whittling down the accumulated debt."

Opposition grows to EU trade deal

Jerusalem Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Opposition is growing to what ministers say are the poor terms of the proposed free trade agreement with the European Union (EU), which many say will not put a dent in Israel's ballooning $7.4-billion trade deficit with Europe.

Agriculture Minister Ya'acov Tsur last week joined Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish in decrying the agreement. "I don't think I can recommend that the cabinet accept it," Tsur said in the Jerusalem Post.

Industry and Trade and Agriculture are the two key ministries affected most by the terms of the proposed agreement. Tsur complained about the lack of European flexibility in raising Israeli agriculture export quotas.

"This is an important issue for us, since 85 per cent of all our agricultural exports goes to Europe," he said.

"In the past, the Europeans said they did not want to help us because of Likud policies in the territories. I have met with five different European agriculture ministers, and now they say they don't want to help us because they have their own economic problems."

Critics of the accord speak with a special sense of urgency, since now is the first time in 20 years Israel is being afforded the opportunity to renegotiate the parameters of trade with Europe.

Midland Walwyn Capital Inc.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you want more bang for your investment buck it pays to have sound financial advice.

"When people come in they think they know what they want. But it's not always appropriate to their needs," said Corrine Spiegel, a financial planner at Midland Walwyn Capital Inc.

Spiegel, a securities dealer for more than 14 years, is a Midland Walwyn vice-president.

Her clients range in age from young working professionals to retired seniors. While her recommendations are specific to each client, they are based on general principals applicable to any age group, she said.

Diversification of an investment portfolio — spreading the assets in different kinds of investments such as bonds, stocks and cash — is important so investors can hedge their bets against changes in the market.

With today's interest rates Spiegel recommends her clients buy long-term government-guaranteed bonds. "The power of compound interest at today's rates is so compelling that it's hard to recommend anything else," she said.

The current high yielding government bonds are such an attractive investment Spiegel has difficulty recommending mutual funds, given the risk and the average rate of return, she said.

Why take a chance?

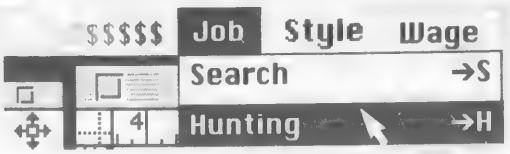
Of the 1046 mutual funds available for sale in Canada, only 106 of the funds averaged returns of 10 per cent or more over the last 10 years, she said. "Why would you take the chance of maybe making 10 per cent when you can make 9½ per cent guaranteed?"

Spiegel specializes in analyzing macro-economic trends, the peaks and valleys. She positions investment funds according to the trends.

"I like to buy when investments are out of favor [with most buyers] because that's when they're a better buy," Spiegel said.

Her work in futures — she follows commodities — helps her determine the rate of inflation, which is directly linked to interest rates.

Many people keep their money in banks because they aren't fully aware of their investment options, she said. "If you take the time to understand [your options] you end up not only with a better rate of return, but with a product better suited to your needs."



This week The CJN is featuring the first of a monthly column on job-searching techniques by job counsellor Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to forward any questions relating to this topic to Lisa Galet, c/o The Canadian Jewish News.

By LISA GALET
Special to The CJN

Looking for a job is an event most of us experience at least once in our lifetime. Lately, more of us have been going through this experience and our limited practice at this activity makes it difficult and demoralizing.

It is a skill we are expected to know and excel at and yet it is not taught in school, we can't really look to our parents and see how they coped, and our experience even five years ago is not that helpful. Moreover, in today's economy, the job hunter has to be sharper, and make a more professional presentation, in order to compete successfully against the many other applicants.

Job hunting has truly become a job in itself. This multi-faceted and underpaid stressful job is probably the most difficult work we will ever do and yet it could be the most important.

Frequently, because we choose to do this work alone, the task is even harder. We expect we can make the perfect resume to locate and secure the perfect employment opportunity. Our desire to be independent coupled with our sense of pride encourages us to go through this ordeal alone, afraid to talk to others for fear they will ostracize us or compete against us.

But by talking to people we gain their support and find out about possible job openings. In job searching, the concept is called networking.

When you talk, be it in person or on the phone, you do not need to let on that you are unemployed. Simply instruct others of your occupation and the fact that you are looking for work.

Saying something like "I am a legal secretary and I'm looking for work opportunities" is enough. When you hear the sound of your own voice repeating aloud "I am a legal secretary" you encourage yourself to present yourself as a legal secretary instead of as an anonymous unemployed person. This message can be a powerful source of motivation and positive reinforcement you need to hear.

Once we know about those possible job openings, we use our resume, to further interest an employer in our potential.

On average, employers spend less than ten seconds on their initial glance at a resume so it must be straightforward and succinct. Rarely more than two pages, attractive, concentrated mostly on the last fifteen years, and offering the major tasks accomplished at your previous jobs — the resume is the tool to use to get the employer to want to meet you.

Cold doesn't deter Zimriah fans

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hundreds of parents and grandparents recently braved the frigid weather to shep nachas from the children who performed in the 30th annual Zimriah, the Jewish school choir festival, held this year at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

"I wouldn't miss this for the world," Evelyn Albert told The CJN. "I would have come if there was 20 feet of snow."

The deep freeze was no deterrent for Albert, who came by bus from Hamilton to watch granddaughter Keren Shilling, 8½, sing with Associated Hebrew School's second choir.

The festival, sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE), has grown in popularity over the years, said coordinator Yael Seliger. This year's festival drew a record 540 students from 12 different schools.

The 1000-seat sanctuary was filled to capacity for both Zimriah shows. There were choirs from seven day schools and five supplementary schools.

The theme of this year's Zimriah was peace. Conductor Doron Ophir taught the choirs to sing several peace songs together, which they did beautifully despite only one rehearsal together.

"You don't only sing to perform," said Zimriah stage manger and choreographer Rivka Atzmony. "You sing for the feeling of the day ... It's the whole ensemble together."

Atzmony credits Ophir with the successes of recent Zimriyot. "He plans it so well. He's a master at what he does," she said. "He brought up the level of the music."

BJE executive director Rabbi Irwin Witty told The CJN Ophir has made an immeasurable contribution to Zimriah, and praised the work of coordinator Seliger.

Zimriah is very much a labor of love for participants and organizers alike. Students and choir masters give up their lunch hours and recesses to begin rehearsals early in the fall. Atzmony said she and Ophir will start planning Zimriah 1996 in the spring. Ophir will spend the summer getting the music ready for September.

Gloria Lupas, a mother who has attended many Zimriyot, came out this year to watch the performance of her daughter Michali, a Grade 3 student at Netivot. Lupas told The CJN she's a big supporter of Zimriah.

"I think it's spectacular, the whole Jewish community coming together like this," she said.

Toronto poet honored in Taiwan

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Accomplished Toronto poet Donia Clenman was honored recently at the 15th World Congress of Poets held in Taipei, Taiwan.

An honorary doctorate in literature was conferred on Clenman "for distinguished achievement in poetry" at a ceremony in the library of the World Academy of Arts and Culture, an umbrella organization under the patronage of UNESCO.

Clenman, 67, was one of 450 delegates to the Taipei event from 43 countries. Israeli poet laureate Puah Shalev-Toren was also present.

"I felt like a camera — so full of unprocessed film that it might take me months of reflection to fully develop them," Clenman said about her impressions of the trip.

Born Donia Klajman in Opatow, Poland, her family moved to Warsaw when she was six. She and her mother survived the Opatow ghetto and Skarzysko and Czestochowa concentration camps. Her father perished in Treblinka.

A frequent visitor to Israel, her works meld her past with her love of Israel and her people. In the near future, she will publish Older and in Love, a retrospective of extended visits to Israel between 1983 and 1992.

She will express her affection for Canada with poetry to be set to music by composer Srul Glick to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir at a performance at Roy Thomson Hall later this year.

Of her Taiwanese experience, Clenman said she learned to appreciate other forms of poetry. "Unlike Western poetry, which is wedded to the printed page, Chinese poetry is sung and performed with such flair and gusto so that even when ignorant of content, we would sit spellbound by the drama of the performance."

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

The Rising Star of Theresa Tova: Television actress and cabaret diva Theresa Tova of Toronto has been packing them in at various clubs around town recently with her magnificent array of torch songs, jazz tunes and teary-eyed Yiddish ballads.

Well-known for her role on the cancelled Canadian television show ENG, Tova recently worked on the pilot of a new TV sitcom, "playing a wonderful, nicer version of Roseanne," she explains. "If the project is a go, I'll be singing in Edmonton next year."

Theresa Tova

Famous within the Jewish community for her heart-rending performances of tunes from Yiddish vaudeville and the ghettos of Eastern Europe, Tova says not just Jews applaud when she sings in Yiddish. "It warms my heart to see these little Jewish bubbies down there at midnight, still listening to me," she says. "But when I sing these songs for non-Jews, they also love them. They cry and they thank me profusely — they seem to appreciate these songs as much as Jewish people do."

In recent months, she has added significantly to her Yiddish repertoire with such new material as Roshinkes mit Mandlen (Raisins and Almonds), Vi Shlecht und Vi Biter (How Hard and How Bitter), Unter Dayne Vayse Shtern (Under Your White Starry Heaven) and Ich Benk Aheym (I Long For Home). She is preparing to sing many of these songs in translation.

Torontonians have several opportunities to hear Tova in concert in coming months. On Feb. 26 at 8 p.m., she performs The Best of Theresa Tova at My Tree House, a club at 485 Church St. Tova's best includes songs from Yiddish to Gershwin, from Sondheim to Patsy Cline; a $6 cover charge applies.

She is also set to appear during a cabaret evening at the Bathurst Jewish Centre March 4. Another opportunity to hear her occurs May 1, when she performs songs from Gershwin to Klezmer at the Adath Israel Synagogue, during a gala celebration of the end of World War II and the liberation of all the concentration camps. She has also accepted an invitation to appear at a Yiddish Cultural Festival in Washington, D.C., in 1996.

When Eye On Arts spoke with her, the ebullient songstress conveyed the impression that she has begun to receive the recognition for her Yiddish performances she so richly deserves. Tova is a powerful, uniquely gifted singer who should be warmly applauded for revitalizing these Yiddish songs and making them accessible to English-speaking audiences.

More Jewish Music: The first event in a three-concert inaugural season of Jewish Music Toronto gets underway 8 p.m. Feb. 26 at the Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. W., when Beth Ann Cole, Judith Lander, Gene DiNovi, Rebecca Enkin and Mark Eisenmann appear in An Evening of Popular Song.

The program features the music of internationally noted composers Leonard Bernstein, Stephen Sondheim and Kurt Weill, as well as Canadian composers Saul Chapman, Barry Little and Shelly Sper. A panel discussion begins at 7 p.m. Tickets ($20) are available from the box office, 416-205-5555.

The second concert in the series, Great Artists in Recital, occurs March 27, and features violinist Jacques Israelievitch and pianist Alexander Tselyakov, performing a program by Mendelssohn, Ellstein, Gershwin, Press, Adaskin, Ben Haim Lavry, Robinovitch, Milhaud and Bloch.

Children's choir gives a soothing performance

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There is nothing quite so soothing and inspirational as the gentle strains of children singing.

With an overflow audience, the event was the successful culmination of Sisterhood Shabat, produced in cooperation with Musica Beth Tikvah as part of its major concert series.

Conducted by choir founder and music director Jean Ashworth Bartle, the chorus of 100 selected kids from grades 5-11 has represented Canada at dozens of international competitions, amassing a wealth of awards and rave reviews. The company recently gave a critically acclaimed concert in New York's Carnegie Hall.

The Beth Tikvah concert was first suggested nearly two years ago by music director Srul Irving Glick, but school and concert obligations stood in the way. "The night has finally arrived," beamed Bartle during her introductory remarks.

The choir sang the rousing Israeli folk songs Hashivenu, Haida, and Dodi Li; Felix Mendelssohn's Lift Thine Eyes and Laudate Pueri ("Children of Israel, we praise thee, oh God"); and Glick's Moments in Time.

The crowd favorite clearly was the hauntingly beautiful Keewaydin, written by noted Canadian composer Harry Freedman and based on the rhythmic Ojibway language of northern Ontario. The children's voices conjured up images of Arctic winds whistling through forests, cascading waterfalls and the aboriginal reverence for nature.

Bartle is much in demand as lecturer and guest conductor of children's choirs. She is currently setting up choral programs for the Toronto Board of Education and teaches music at Blythwood Public School.

She told The CJN the Toronto Children's Chorus was started 15 years ago as a way "to motivate and understand children. What our young people want most is an opportunity to be heard and to perform. These kids thrive on the discipline and hard work required to achieve this level of musical skill."

The greatest reward, Bartle said, has been seeing the students develop as artists and as people. "Many of our graduates have gone on to become teachers and choral directors; others are now aspiring composers and songwriters. All of them are in some way 'addicted' to music."

Toronto ballet shows Jews and blacks can get along fine

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Malca Litovitz believes fervently that blacks and Jews can get along and she expresses this eloquently in her text for the ballet People Like Us.

Voice One:
Don't hurt us as you fight your cause
We've been done so wrong.
Don't hurt us as you fight for truth
We want to march along.
Voice Two:
We're not your nanny.
We're not slaves, chattels or machines.
We're proud and free.
Let us be your equals,
We'll dance from sea to sea.

Litovitz, a professor of English at Seneca College, who gets along well with her many black students, was bitterly disappointed when People Like Us was cancelled after a black politician complained that it perpetuated stereotypes.

Now Litovitz and the ballet's co-creators, Shula Saltzman, artistic director of Me'Irim Dance Company, and Patrick Parsons, black director of Ballet Creole, are hoping to revive it because they think it is important to clear the air after the strain of the Show Boat debate. All three say the politician's complaint is ill-founded, that their purpose is to denounce stereotypes of blacks and Jews alike.

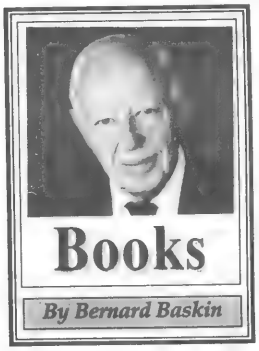
Malca Litovitz

Litovitz' interest in the subject goes back a long way. A black professor at the University of Toronto, Frederick Case, gave her an A on an undergraduate paper describing how both black and Jewish authors reflected the tensions and the triumphs in relations between their two races in the period from 1940 to 1970.

Before writing People Like Us, she had long talks with the black dancers of Ballet Creole and with Dr. Tony McFarlane, of Hamilton, a black with a Jewish grandmother, who is second vice-president of Reform Temple Anshe Shalom and an active multiculural worker.

Saltzman, who is a student of both literature and dance, is at a loss to explain the rupture in black-Jewish relations. "There has been a big change and I don't understand how and why the split has happened," she said. "There is more tension and less harmony than I remember as a child."

Saltzman's father, Rabbi Meyer Strassfeld, of Boston, marched with civil rights workers at Selma, Alabama, in the early 1960s.



Books

By Bernard Baskin

Fear Of Fifty, by Erica Jong (Harper-Collins, $29.95).

Two decades ago, Erica Jong's lubricious novel, Fear of Flying, won her fame and fortune. John Updike waxed enthusiastic. "The book," he wrote, "has class and sass, brightness and the bite . . . and her cheerful sexual frankness brings a new flavor to female prose."

Jong's narrative detailed the amorous education and adventures of a young woman determined to experience life to the fullest. It was funny, frank, brash and outrageous — unflinching in its observations of her role in the battle between the sexes.

Now, at 50, concerned with aging and fearful of the future, she sets down her thoughts on a wide range of subjects. "Modern women," she complains, "are part of a Whiplash Generation raised to be Doris Day . . . yearning to be Gloria Steinem (and raising) our mid-life daughters in the age of Nancy Reagan and Princess Di."

It is no surprise that women reaching 50 are in a state of perplexity and rage. None of the things they counted on have come to pass, she writes. "Instead, the ground under their feet keeps constantly shifting.

Surprisingly, at 50, this pampered and hedonistic woman is concerned with the spiritual emptiness of society and the relentless dicta of the marketplace. "My body is not the issue. It's whether or not I have the right to my immortal soul . . . It is not a matter of ad and fashion. It is not a matter of new-age or 12-step hype. It is the essence of whether we are allowed to be fully human or not. If you own your soul, you don't have to be afraid at 50."

In the chapter entitled How I Got to be Jewish, Jong regrets her lack of identification with Judaism and the Jewish people. "It seems astonishing to me that a woman born at the height of the Holocaust should not have been trained to a stronger sense of Judaism. And I also begin to regret not having raised [daughter] Molly more Jewishly, and not having had more Jewish children to replace those lost among the six million.

"Lately I have begun to yearn for solidarity with other Jewish feminists, to join the search for nonsexist Jewish rituals, to celebrate my Jewishness without shame, without internalized anti-Semitism, and to embrace my Jewishness as part of my search for truth in my writing."

Where the mitzvot are concerned she writes, with tongue in cheek, that women had better get busy in observing them if they want to enter " 'the obscure heaven of the Jews.' If men need 613 mitzvahs, I figure women need 1,839."

Despite myths to the contrary, Jong believes there is still plenty of anti-Semitism in America — especially of a social nature. "Otherwise, we'd be saying 'next year in Oyster Bay' or 'Grosse Pointe,' instead of 'Next Year in Jerusalem.'

Her 1987 historical novel, Serenissima, concerned a Jewish heroine in 16th-century Venice who meets and falls in love with a youthful William Shakespeare. "Venice in the 16th century was Manhattan in the early 20th century: teeming with Jews driven out of Europe and the Middle East, designed to enrich the Christian world and to change it forever . . . they became a force. And they prospered. And Venice prospered."

She is genuinely puzzled and angry at women who are resentful or jealous of their successful sisters. "I realized gradually that women had managed to do to me what men no longer had the power to do: make me feel utterly and absolutely in the wrong, make me hate my own creativity, distrust my own impression. Every time I put pen to paper I would see a chorus of jeering women telling me that everything I said was not worth saying."

Written with verve and dash, often touching and wise, this memoir of the introspective author at 50 — although not recommended to the traditionally religious or decorous reader — will stimulate discussion and, undoubtedly, some titillation.

Books explore Canadian sights

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

For travellers who like to explore lesser-known destinations off the highway, Back Roads and Getaway Places of Canada (Reader's Digest, $49.95) makes an excellent backseat companion.

This full-sized, 400-page compendium details some 300 sites in 22 regional chapters compiled by some 190 writers across Canada.

Back Roads and Getaway Places of Canada presents attractive and uncluttered regional highway maps, exquisite full-color photographs on every page, and encyclopedic coverage of quaint communities, peaceful islands, scenic provincial parks and beaches. In keeping with its general unhurried tone, the book also includes information on nature walks, hiking trails, and 26 national parks.

Many chapters feature a "Roads to Explore" section, which highlights, for instance, the mills and marshes on the Lake Erie shore, or the only road on the southern coast of Labrador. Many entries feature a "Special Events" box with local festivals, fairs and other events listed.

Besides being a good companion on the road, Back Roads and Getaway Places of Canada is an ideal book for armchair travellers, who can easily spend hours poring over its pages, devising real or imaginary journeys.

A guidebook that is much better suited for jet or rail travel, however, is Lonely Planet's recently updated volume on Canada ($24.95). Much smaller and lighter than the Reader's Digest tome, Lonely Planet's Canada packs just as much or more quality information into its 936 pages.

Based in Australia, Lonely Planet published its first travel book in 1973. Today its more than 130 titles continue to focus on budget travel with an adventurous approach, providing the personal impressions of their individual writers when appropriate. Reflecting this successful tradition, the volume on Canada is an astonishingly comprehensive overview of this country, with a remarkable level of detail.

All in all, Lonely Planet's newly-reprinted guidebook to Canada ranks as possibly the best such book of its kind. It does not take a backseat either to Michelin or Frommer, two other worthy contenders.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

Travel Guide to Jordan: When I visited Jordan several years ago, I searched in vain for a good guidebook, finding Fodor's and other lighthearted fare inadequate. In the bookshop in the Marriott Hotel in Amman, I found The Antiquities of Jordan by G. Lankester Harding a wonderful guidebook filled with historical details, empirical descriptions and plenty of maps and photographs. Written in 1959 and revised in the 1970s, the book is still the best I have seen on the subject, providing a thorough, well-written background for the discerning traveller.

Lonely Planet's travel guide to Jordan and Syria is an excellent complement to Lankester Harding's volume because it provides myriad details and tips regarding travel in the modern Hashemite kingdom. It provides a succinct geopolitical history, vivid descriptions, useful sketchmaps, drawings, photographs and much practical information.

"If Jordan and Syria were anywhere else in the world, they would be crawling with sightseers, but Syria and Jordan are in the heart of the volatile Middle East and are low on most peoples' list of places worth visiting," the introduction begins. "Given its unflattering media profile — that of a region of barren desert and fanatics bent on revolution — it is a surprise to many that not only is it safe to travel here, but that the local Arab inhabitants are among the most hospitable in the world."

Of course, if you're Jewish, it's wise to avoid Syria for the moment; likewise, several of the Arab Gulf States, for which Lonely Planet recently issued a new and intriguing travel guide. Better wait for a true and lasting peace between Israel and the Arab world.

Air Canada to Barbados: This season, Barbados and Air Canada mark the 45th anniversary of their association, noting that the lowest available fares have increased, on average, merely one dollar a year in 45 years.

"Compare the cost of flying to Barbados to Canada's cost of living, which has certainly increased since 1949, and the remarkable value of this flight becomes obvious," said Hugh Riley, manager of the Barbados Tourism Authority in Canada.

Air Canada's non-stop service to Barbados is offered daily.

Traveling the I-75: Every year, thousands of Canadian snowbirds trek to Florida along this American highway, which runs southward from Detroit to the sunshine state. Along the Interstate-75 by Dave Hunter is a mile-by-mile driving guide. It describes roadside history, scenery, attractions and every exit and travel facility (gas, food, motels).

Its many pages of colored maps and travel information include notes on road construction and police radar, welcome centres and rest areas, major radio stations by type of music and traffic reports, factory outlet malls and much more. The spiral-bound, 176-page book is available for $21.95 from CAA Travel Centres and Smithbooks, Coles and other bookstores.

Western Jerusalem market a veritable feast for the eyes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — In the years immediately after the 1967 Six Day War, Jerusalemites flocked to the open air markets of predominantly-Arab East Jerusalem and beyond.

Prices were lower and the atmosphere was infinitely more exotic.

But in the past few years, with rising terrorism, fewer and fewer Israelis have ventured forth to Arab markets, fearing for their safety.

Instead, they've returned to an old standby in Western Jerusalem, the Mahane Yehuda Market, which attracts thrifty shoppers and a whole lot of curious tourists.

The market, most of which is covered, bustles with people and is redolent with typical Middle Eastern aromas, from falafel in cooking oil and olives in brine to freshly-baked rolls and fragrant fruits and vegetables.

As I ambled through one afternoon, I was treated to a veritable feast for the eyes.

I saw gleaming mounds of green, gray, purple and brown olives, as well as bins brimming with appetizing tomatoes, thick bananas, luscious green and red peppers, purplish eggplants, delectable persimons, rosy apples, dull pears and ripe onions.

As I paused, shoppers walked or brushed past me, carrying heavy bags filled with the bountiful produce of the land.

I stopped to admire a wide array of nuts, sunflower seeds, beans, lentils, candies and flowers.

Market bustles with people

As I rounded a corner and headed into daylight, I stopped at a kosher bakery, lining up to buy salty cheese-and-sesame bourekas, the Balkan specialty to which my Bulgarian mother-in-law introduced me more than 20 years ago.

Although I asked the vendor for one boureka, I got three. "They go down quickly," he explained.

And he was right. They were warm and chewy and delicious, and gone within minutes.

Having whetted my appetite, I stopped at a falafel-and-shwarma stand, which also happened to be kosher.

I ordered a shwarma sandwich, a pita stuffed with thin slices of mouth-watering lamb and garnished with tehina, red hot sauce, shredded cabbage and finely diced cucumbers and tomatoes.

As fast food goes, it was perfect.

The following night, my wife and I were taken out by friends to one of the many fine Middle Eastern restaurants within the boundaries of the market which are certified by the rabbinate in Jerusalem.

We began with starters like hummus and eggplant salad, graduated to mixed grill main dishes and finished with coffee and baklava.

It was a meal to remember.

Israeli B&B's popular

KIBBUTZ AFIK — Country hospitality is sweeping Israel.

Low-cost bed and breakfast holidays in kibbutzim and moshavim situated near some of the most scenic parts of Israel are attracting a growing number of Israelis and tourists.

The recently developed hospitality centre at Kibbutz Afik, overlooking the Sea of Galilee in the southern Golan, is in the forefront of this new tourism.

Afik and others differ from the long-established kibbutz guest houses by offering more intimate access to kibbutz life at a far lower cost.

Visitors are welcomed to Afik's modern 24-room complex by members from various parts of the world. Didi Neufeld, formerly of London and representative of the 60 member families, manages the B&B with an efficient, personal touch.

The main advantage, Neufeld points out, is economic. Israeli B&Bs, also called tzimmerim (from the German word for room), cost between $14 per person for a four-member family group during low season and $25 during high season. A hearty kibbutz breakfast is included, of course.

Touring Israel while taking advantage of country hospitality can bring a visitor close to many attractions. Guests at Afik receive substantial discounts to nearby Hamat Gader, whose Roman baths are partly owned by the kibbutz.

Israel to rely less on Palestinian labor

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel is well on its way to liberating itself from its dependency on Palestinian labor, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin reportedly told the cabinet last Sunday.

Rabin said there are already 59,000 foreign workers in the country, and another 11,000 would arrive within the next few weeks.

Rabin and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat agreed during a meeting last week that Israel would transfer over $11 million to alleviate the problem of Palestinian unemployment, Economics Minister Shimon Shetreet told the Jerusalem Post.

He termed the money an "advance" that would be used for long-term joint projects, but other officials indicated the money was more of a grant that, in the short term, would help Gaza cope economically with Israel's decision to wean itself away from dependency on Palestinian labor.

If this is indeed the case, it would mark the first known time Israel is paying the Palestinian Authority to offset the effects of the closure.

Uri Dromi, a Rabin spokesperson, said the move toward reducing dependency on Palestinian workers is "an outgrowth of reality.

"The prime minister spoke about separation, and this

BB brief meets with hostility

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith, Quebec region's League for Human Rights had to contend with hostile questions and audience heckling last week during its staunchly federalist presentation to the Montreal sovereignty commission.

But League officials said they felt they got their point across that the negative consequences of secession for the average Quebecer do not justify the risks or costs.

"Don't forget we were talking to a group who cannot be convinced," B'nai Brith director Robert Libman told The CJN.

The sessions, being broadcast on community-access television, are aimed at the estimated 25 per cent of undecided Quebecers.

Greg Bordan presented the brief from a table crowded with B'nai Brith officials. "No, we were not surprised by the reception," he said.

"It's a very emotional matter, and on the whole, the commission was very respectful."

Expert says 'no shortcuts' to Jewish education

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A self-described optimist, Ze'ev Mankowitz has no trouble expounding on what's right with Jewish education today, both in the Diaspora and in Israel.

But asked what's wrong with it, Mankowitz, among the world's foremost experts on the subject, cradles his chin and pauses for a full three minutes.

"If we have one weakness," he says finally, "it's an attempt to provide the kind of Jewish education that is easily digestible, almost canned. If we accept that there are no shortcuts, then the rewards will be there. Jewish education only fails when it's flat and mechanical, instead of what it should be: rich and satisfying."

Ze'ev Mankowitz

Mankowitz has spent the better part of his professional life trying to make Jewish education more appealing and less cumbersome. The one-time professor at Jerusalem's Hebrew University is now director of the university's Melton Centre for Jewish Education in the Diaspora, a postgraduate degree-granting program and think tank.

With such a broad mandate, Mankowitz says he's an expert in forests, not trees. He prefers the big picture, and the picture of Jewish education today, he says, is vastly different from five years ago.

"At long last, the isolation teachers of Judaism felt is coming to an end," he told The CJN during a recent Toronto stopover to recruit candidates for the centre's programs. "The feeling that one is engaged in a lonely, low-paid, under-appreciated profession with not much prestige and no clear path for advancement is beginning to end.

"For the first time, many communities are beginning to provide proper [teacher] training facilities. That is a real sea change."

So, he feels, are the increasing extents to which communities around the world are making Jewish education a priority.

What's been at the root of this sudden upturn and interest? Mankowitz believes it's two pivotal events, both of which have taken some 50 years to seep into the Jewish psyche: the Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel.

"These are deep, powerful factors, and they have given us confidence and courage and a new appreciation of ourselves. They have taken a long time to assess and percolate down to become part of our self-understanding."

Adding to the current renewal in Jewish pedagogy, Mankowitz feels, is " the beginning of a Jewish renaissance across the board, in art, culture and learning. It is within that context that we are starting to regroup."

The News In Brief Everywhere

ISRAEL

Cabbies Demand Safety

JERUSALEM — Several dozen taxi drivers demonstrated in Jerusalem last week after the funeral of a cabby thought to be murdered by terrorists.

Angry drivers demanded the government pay for more security measures, such as barriers between the front and back seats.

Rafi Cohen, 35, was fatally stabbed in north Jerusalem last week, apparently by two terrorists who, police said, disguised themselves as Jews.

Cohen was the fifth cab driver killed in the past year.

Ethiopian Morale Low

JERUSALEM — Motivation among Ethiopian-born males to serve in the Israel Defence Force (IDF) is low and decreasing, according to research being conducted by IDF psychologists.

The study is a follow-up to earlier research, which found Ethiopians profoundly disillusioned with their absorption in the country. It said new conscripts carry that dissatisfaction into the IDF.

Post is Barred

JERUSALEM — Egypt has barred distribution of the Jerusalem Post following publication of an article critical of several Egyptian officials.

The story criticized Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa and presidential political adviser Osama el-Baz for displaying "insensitivity" towards Israel.

A Lotto Luck

JERUSALEM — A Palestinian from Gaza last week claimed the $2-million prize he won in the state lottery.

He was the sole winner in last month's drawing, but was unable to collect his winnings because of the closure of the territories in the wake of the suicide bombing at Beit Lid Junction that killed 21 Israelis.

Last Wednesday, the winner, who concealed his identity by wearing a plastic bag over his head, went to lottery headquarters in Tel Aviv.

Israel Prize

HAIFA — Two University of Haifa professors, novelist A.B. Yehoshua and poet Natan Zach, have been named co-laureates of the prestigious Israel Prize for Literature, Poetry and Translation. The annual award, often compared to the Pulitzer Prize, will be formally presented on Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day.

Apartments For Sale

JERUSALEM — The Council of Jewish Settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza has embarked on a campaign to sell area apartments to Jews abroad.

Buyers would then rent them to Israelis who want to move into the areas but can't afford the apartments or are wary of risking their money.

Council spokesperson Yehiel Leiter said "a couple of dozen" of apartments have been sold in the United States and Europe, and that the council is continuing to market the units.

Leiter said Diaspora Jews are being asked to invest in, rather than donate to, the territories.

WORLD

Kidnapped Leader Returns

SAN SALVADOR — The leader of El Salvador's Jewish community returned safely home last week after being kidnapped here last month.

Jean-Claude Kahn, 51, a businessman of French descent, was abducted Jan. 31 from his car by six armed men in downtown San Salvador, a local police source said.

The kidnapping was believed to be motivated by financial reasons and was not a terrorist operation, the source said.

New Aussie Files

SYDNEY — Investigators have started to prepare a new list of suspected Nazi war criminals living in Australia, a federal police official said recently.

The suspects, on a list given to police by the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre, are believed to be former members of Nazi killing squads that operated in German-occupied Lithuania.

The issue was reignited with the publication in last week's Australia/Israel Review of an angry attack of the Australian government by Robert Greenwood, who led investigations between 1987 and 1991 of alleged war criminals living in Australia.

"The politicians of this country have let down the Jewish people," he said.

New Denial Law

BRUSSELS — The Belgian Parliament has enacted a law making it a criminal offense to distribute Holocaust-denial literature.

Prior to the new legislation, Belgium was, along with Denmark, one of the few Western European countries where the publication of revisionist books was not a punishable crime.

But under the new law, violators may be jailed for up to one year and fined about $200.

Anti-Semitism Up

BONN — Incidents of anti-Semitism rose in Germany last year, especially among youth, according to figures released this month by the General Security Service.

The study found that by mid-November 1994, the number of anti-Semitic incidents stood at 802, compared to 656 incidents during all of 1993.

Fewer Jewish cemeteries were desecrated last year, but more cases of ethnic incitement were recorded, particularly Holocaust denial.

A record high 78 per cent of the perpetrators were younger than 20.

HEBREW BASIC BURIAL

TRADITIONAL GRAVESIDE SERVICE

Jewish families may now arrange economical yet dignified interment through HEBREW BASIC BURIAL. Traditional Halachic standards are strictly observed. This new option caters to families who are comfortable with a traditional graveside service and a more involved role in order to reduce expenses.

HEBREW BASIC BURIAL is the only facility in Metropolitan Toronto providing this adherence to Halacha and attention to detail at exceptionally low cost, exclusively to the Jewish community. If you would like to make inquiries, please call 780-0596 for further information.

Toronto remains Canada's Jewish centre

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To no one's surprise, Toronto remains the "major centre" of Canadian Jewry, with the city and its environs home to almost half of all Canadian Jews, according to a major study released last week in Montreal.

The 200-page report by McGill University's Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning is based on the 1991 federal census results, and provides the most in-depth analyses on population trends, immigration, poverty, family structures and intermarriage available in the Jewish community.

It found that in 1991, there were 162,605 Jews living in Metro Toronto and surrounding regions, a 26 per cent increase over a decade earlier and a whopping 70 per cent jump since the 1971 census — a "profound and unparalleled demographic transformation."

Over 45 per cent of Canada's 356,315 Jews in 1991 lived in Toronto and environs, says the study, which was conducted with the Council of Jewish Federations Canada, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Statistics Canada.

The numbers make Toronto the eighth largest Jewish community in North America, the study notes, adding that Jews here constituted 4.2 per cent of the city's total population, making it Canada's most Jewish city.

But the figures differ slightly from the results of the 1991 census, which listed "Jewish" under two different headings: ethnic origin and religion. Respondents could answer yes to one or both.

The McGill team, headed by Prof. Jim Torczyner, blended the census results for a more accurate snapshot. In calculating who is Jewish, researchers came up with three categories: those identifying themselves as Jewish by religion as well as ethnic origin, by religion only and by ethnic roots alone.

The study found that in Toronto, the total Jewish population broke down this way: 133,745 said they were Jewish by religion and by ethnic background; 17,370 said they were Jewish by religion but with other ethnic origins; and 11,485 claimed no religion but felt Jewish by ethnic origin.

Excluded from the total were the 10,915 people who said they were Jewish by ethnic origin but practised another religion.

Poverty for one in seven

Researchers found that degrees of religious identification were "extremely high" in Toronto, with nearly 93 per cent of the city's Jews identifying with Judaism as a faith. Only Montreal had a higher degree of identification with Judaism as a religion, at 96 per cent of that city's total. The lowest was Vancouver at 74 per cent.

However, the study warns that there is "evidence of weakened patterns of identification" among children and young adults in Toronto. Of Jews aged 65 and over, 97 per cent identified with the Jewish religion, but the ratio slips to 91 per cent among those aged 15 to 19.

Intermarriage in Toronto remained low, with only nine per cent of all Jews living in intermarried families, compared to the national average of 14.8 per cent in 1991. But the study adds that intermarriage in Toronto is increasing, particularly among Canadian-born Jews aged 25 to 34: 14.6 per cent in this age group lived in intermarried families.

Almost 13 per cent of all Jewish children in Toronto lived in families where at least one parent was not Jewish, the report found.

Immigrants "have transformed Toronto Jewish life," the study says. More than 27,000 Jewish immigrants have settled in Toronto in the past 20 years, and almost one-third of the entire population was born outside Canada. Most recent immigrants came from the former Soviet Union, followed by Israel and South Africa.

Other Toronto tidbits:

- From 1986 to 1991, over 7,300 Jews moved to Toronto from elsewhere in Canada. Of those, 62 per cent came from Quebec.
- One out of seven Toronto Jews, or over 21,000 people, lives near or below the poverty line. Women are more likely to be poor than men, and more than one-third of the Jewish poor were elderly.
- Just over 15 per cent of Toronto Jewry was aged 65 and over. Almost one-third of the elderly were "unattached."
- There were 12,685 Holocaust survivors in Toronto in 1991, and one-third of all elderly Jews were survivors.
- Over 43,000 Jews lived in York Region, just north of Toronto, making it the third largest concentration of Jews in Canada. Seven out of eight Toronto Jews lived in a narrow corridor extending northward through Toronto, North York and southern York Region.
- Almost 78 per cent of Toronto Jews lived in two-parent families, with 6.6 per cent in single-parent families. Of those, 82 per cent were headed by women. Almost half of all Toronto Jews were married in 1991.
- Half of all Jews in Toronto were enrolled in university or had completed a bachelor's degree — about twice the rate of the general community. Sixteen per cent had a graduate degree in 1991, compared to the overall Canadian rate of four per cent.
- Women in Toronto were underrepresented in the professions. Jewish men were almost twice as likely as Jewish women to be managers; three times as likely to be architects, accountants and lawyers; and four times as likely to be doctors and dentists. Jewish women were twice as likely as Jewish men to be teachers.

Racial attitudes discussed at Holy Blossom program

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A comment by a black former Ontario cabinet minister that Jews are not as understanding of the position of blacks in society as they were when she attended Harbord Collegiate was challenged by a Jewish professor at the University of Toronto recently.

The exchange between Zanane Akande, former minister of community and social services in the NDP government, and Professor Michael Marrus, a historian, took place at the end of a long panel discussion celebrating black history month at Holy Blossom Temple sponsored by the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat.

Speaking from the floor, Akande said her Jewish classmates walked out at Harbord Collegiate when a teacher made derogatory remarks about blacks, and the teacher later apologized. "Now I live in this neighborhood (near the temple) and my children go to schools here and there is a difference in the attitude of Jews."

The former cabinet minister said Jews seem unwilling to accept blacks as equals and suggested the former friendly feeling between the races was based on blacks being an underdog.

In responding, panelist Marrus suggested there was "a huge measure of subjectivity," in Akande's asessment. In his main presentation, Marrus said both blacks and Jews are victims of the tragedies in their history and subject "to the triumphalism of pain."

When the professor said that possibly Akande was reacting to her own "discomfort" in relations with Jews, she returned to the microphone to say: "They were uncomfortable reacting to my being an equal.

Zanane Akande

Michael Marrus

"You want to set the standards, that is a privilege of your race," she told Marrus.

"You may be wrong about this," Marrus responded. He ended the largely good-natured exchange by saying, "let's talk."

Earlier, a Grade 6 Jewish student at a North York public school asked the panel for advice. He said he had told the principal and his teacher about racist remarks being made by a fellow student, who had previously been expelled for five days for the same reason. The principal and teacher took no action, he said.

"You've done all you can," replied black lawyer Roger Rowe, while panelist Carol Tator, a race relations consultant, said: "You are an inspiration to everyone here."

Good relations betwen blacks and Jews in the 1940s and 1950s have deteriorated because "Jews have made it," said panelist Metro councillor Bev Salmon. The daughter of a Jamaican immigrant and an Irish Catholic mother, Salmon said she represents an area (North York-Centre South) that is 30 per cent Jewish. During her campaigning, she said she was offended by people who commented "Your skin color is not really very black."

Her father, who came here to join the Canadian Army in World War I, faced discrimination as did her husband who went back to school and is today a surgeon.

"Very few blacks are not harassed by the police and I don't think that happens to Jews," Salmon said. When she speaks up on behalf of blacks, she said she gets lots of hate mail.

"Jews and blacks exist in two solitudes and each has developed an attitude of moral superiority to the other," said Tator, chair, national social action committee, Canadian Council of Reform Judaism.

"Relations between blacks and Jews are more openly distrustful than ever before," she said. "The central problem is not polarization between us but the systemic racism endemic to Canadian culture and its effects against blacks."

"I assure you there was no anti-Jewish feeling in the coalition to stop Show Boat," said Rowe, its co-founder. When anti-Semitism became a factor in the debate, he suggested Jews used that to opt out of any discussion on whether racism in Show Boat was relevant.

"While Jews have reaped the benefits of white privilege in North America, which blacks will never have, many in the Jewish community still do not feel safe," he said.

Nobel Peace Prize committee member explains resignation

By SEAN MICHAEL KERNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Had Kaare Kristiansen not resigned last year from the Nobel Peace Prize selection committee because of the co-awarding of the prize to PLO chief Yasser Arafat, "I wouldn't have been able to look at myself in the mirror. I wouldn't sleep; I'd have nightmares all the time."

Before a supportive audience of over 200 and three standing ovations at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue last week, Kristiansen explained why, in a highly-publicized and unprecedented move, he quit the peace prize selection committee.

If he had not resigned, he said, it would have been an endorsement for Arafat.

"I had to ask myself," he said, "what are the qualifications for a man to receive the Nobel Peace Prize, the most prestigious prize in the world?

"In my view, Arafat had no qualifications when you looked at his past. That is the most important thing: To what degree has the candidate contributed to peace in the past? You couldn't say that in any way about a man who for 30 years saw it as his main task to spread terror and violence in the world, who has so many innocent lives on his conscience.

"My decision was to say no, no, no" to Arafat's candidacy for the prize.

Kristiansen, a former speaker of Norway's parliament who served on the Nobel selection committee from 1986 to 1994, said he attempted to dissuade his colleagues from awarding the prize to the PLO leader.

The peace process itself was not the reason for Kristiansen's resignation.

"My attitude was not a demonstration against the peace process, which I firmly believe in," he said.

"My resignation from the committee was directed against Arafat and his candidature for the prize ... There may be instances where a government is forced to negotiate even with a scoundrel, but on the other side, it doesn't mean that we should give that man a reward. That was my problem.

"Could I give a reward to a man who had such a past and would be unpredictable for the future? I found it was impossible for me."

The reason for Kristiansen's stand against his peers had a lot to do with what he sees as the moral responsibility Christian Europeans have for Jews.

Conscience would have plagued him

"How could it happen?" asked Kristiansen, referring to the Holocaust. "How could we as Christians in Norway and other countries allow such atrocities to occur to our Jewish brothers and sisters?

"It is the responsibility of the countries that voted for the new Israeli state in 1947 to allow the State of Israel to develop further. And in Europe we must make it clear that we will not let atrocities to the Jewish people happen again. To do that, we have to be sure to do something; we cannot wait to see what others do ... The most dangerous thing is not to care."

Kristiansen's talk was co-sponsored by Beth Emeth, Beth David Synagogue and the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers.

MS fundraiser night

WINNIPEG — The New Leadership Division of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, Winnipeg chapter, is hosting a comedy night on April 1, in support of multiple sclerosis research at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The featured performer will be comic John Rogers who has appeared on A&E's An Evening at the Improv and CBC's Just for Laughs, and has given performances as far away as Australia.

Multiple sclerosis (MS) affects over 50,000 Canadians and their families. The disease, marked by loss of balance, numbness, extreme fatigue and sometimes blindness and paralysis, generally strikes adults ages 20 to 40.

At the Hebrew University, researchers at the laboratory of neuro-immunology are investigating a promising new treatment with an immunomodulatory agent called Linomide.

The Winnipeg New Leadership Multiple Sclerosis Endowment Fund will support continued research into Linomide and a larger study to determine optimal dosages and methods of administration.

Vancouver's Bellas to vie for national Congress post

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Renee Switzer Bellas, the retiring chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, is throwing her hat in the ring for election as chair of Congress' national executive, the top position after the president.

Involved with Congress since 1984, Bellas has participated in the Soviet Jewry committee, which she chaired from 1986 to 1989. She was elected chair of the Jewish parliamentary affairs committee, Pacific region, in 1989 and was named chair of the region in 1992.

During her term with the Soviet Jewry committee she was instrumental in arranging a number of family reunifications in British Columbia, and when serving on the Parliamentary committee, she maintained regular contact with MPs in the areas of particular concern to the Jewish community.

Erwin Nest, executive director of the region, says that as chair of the Pacific region for the past three years "Renee has greatly increased the profile and recognition of Canadian Jewish Congress both within the Jewish community and the general community."

'Vision and relevance'

Bellas believes the importance of Congress in the history of Canadian Jewry is well documented "and I am proud to be one of its active volunteers."

She said the "vision and relevance" of Congress' mandate "make it even more important to the status and welfare of the Jewish community — today and for the future."

She sees the national executive as a vehicle "for discussion and decision making that reflects the views of Jewish Canadians from all walks of life." She hopes to "provide a balance to Congress leadership by bringing my perspective as a businesswoman who is an active member of the fastest growing Jewish constituency in Canada — the West."

The Pacific region serves about 25,000 Jews in British Columbia and the Northwest and Yukon Territories.

Bellas has been a member of the national executive and officers' board since 1990. She has also served on the board and executive of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and is currently vice-president for liaising with community agencies. She won a Federation Young Leadership Award in 1988.

In 1987 Bellas spearheaded a program in the Vancouver public school system to provide a food program for hungry children.

Born in Calgary, she got her BA at the University of British Columbia in classical studies and museology and helped plan and design Vancouver's new museum.

She is vice-president of William Switzer & Associates Ltd., a family firm with factories in Vancouver, Italy and Spain. The company makes fine furniture for the Canadian market and exports to the United States, Europe and Japan.

Meeting with Manning disappoints Jewish leaders

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal Jewish community leaders met privately with Reform Party leader Preston Manning earlier this month and left disappointed that he did not show a greater sensitivity to the issue of Nazi war criminal prosecution, or to the situation of anglophones in Quebec.

At his party's request, Manning met Feb. 9 with about 25 leaders of Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith, FEDERATION CJA and the Canada-Israel Committee at the offices of chartered accountants Fuller Landau.

The one-hour meeting was Manning's first with the Quebec Jewish community. It came four days before the Reform party fielded its first candidates in three federal byelections in Quebec.

B'nai Brith national vice-president Stephen Scheinberg felt Manning missed an opportunity to score points with his Jewish audience.

"It would have been easy for him to say he believes Canada should move vigorously on Nazi war criminals, given that he knows Jews are unhappy with the federal government's decision to prosecute only four more of them and deport the rest," Scheinberg said.

"He just didn't have anything to offer us."

Manning raised hackles when he appeared to suggest prosecuting perpetrators of more recent atrocities is more important than going after "80- and 90-year-olds."

Thomas Hecht, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee Quebec region (CIC-Q) and a Congress presidential candidate, was so incensed by the remark that he called Manning later for a clarification.

Preston Manning

"He showed a great degree of insensitivity," Hecht said. "The Holocaust cannot be compared to ordinary, garden-variety war crimes. The Holocaust was unique in the history of mankind."

Manning later told The CJN he is in favor of prosecutions in Canada and called the Liberal government's decision to deport suspected war criminals "a cop-out."

Manning's position on Quebec sovereignty also seemed to fall flat before his audience. B'nai Brith regional executive director Robert Libman, who organized the meeting, said Manning's "continuous attacks" on the constitutional status quo will only help Quebec Premier Jacques Parizeau.

"He seemed to lack an understanding of what Quebec is all about," Hecht said. "I can't see how he will achieve anything here if he continues to talk about equality among the provinces."

Most of the community leaders who spoke to The CJN were favorably impressed by Manning as a person. "His non-demagogic posture and sincerity is very attractive for the '90s; we just disagree with almost everything he said," Scheinberg said.

"He came across as a reasonable person, very low-key and quite well-informed," said Congress Quebec region chair Manuel Shacter.

Shacter felt Manning was open to suggestions from Quebecers on how to approach the constitutional issue, and that he would ensure his party did not appear to be hostile to Quebec's aspirations. Nevertheless, he sensed a "wide gulf" between Manning and the leaders present.

Those interviewed were also pleased with Manning's quickness to root out extremist elements that may be attracted to his party. "On the issue of rednecks, Manning was unequivocal that there is no room for racism in the party," Hecht said.

BJC seeks director

TORONTO — The Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) is advertising for a new chief executive to take over from Gordon Wolfe who has temporarily assumed the position.

The centre is inviting applications from across Canada, through ads placed in several newspapers.

"Ideally, we're seeking a creative individual with strong people skills and management experience at a community agency," said Wolfe. "The BJC is, after all, a community centre with a voluntary board of directors, not a private club."

The deadline for applications, either by mail or fax, is March 3. The centre will contact only applicants selected for an interview.

The budget for the centre, which employs over 100 people, is about $5 million. The BJC operates not only athletic facilities, but also camps, a day-care and preschool program, activities for individuals with special needs, the Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Leah Posluns Theatre. The theatre will reopen when renovations are completed and a rental policy is in place.

Offensive and dangerous

Some of the Canadian media last week again picked up the story of Israeli citizens, former immigrants from the C.I.S., forced to leave Canada because the Federal Court had denied their attempt to land here from Israel as refugees. The focus of the coverage was to elicit sympathy for these families who now faced the prospect of having to return to Israel.

The story was not new. But, as in the summer, when it first broke, the way it was presented to the Canadian public was troublesome since so many essential details were omitted.

In addition to the total lack of credible corroboration of the allegations of persecution, none of the reports bothered to inform Canadians that each and every one of the claimants, like all other citizens of Israel, had been free, at all times, to leave Israel to try to build a better life for themselves in whichever country on earth would accept them. That they chose to arrive in Canada and then claim to be refugees, rather than apply for normal visas of entry into Canada, or into any other country for that matter, says more about them than about Israel.

But Patrick Martin's report on the issue in the Globe and Mail this past weekend, was more than troublesome. It was shoddy, offensive and dangerous. By relying primarily upon sources who are widely regarded in Israel as non-representative, he writes sweeping, subjective statements as if they were fact. And the statements which he posits as fact indict an entire society, demean Israel's democracy and impugn its democratic institutions.

Martin writes that "Israel is not exactly a Western-style democracy. It has no constitution that protects human rights and freedoms." He then quotes one of his sources as saying, "[T]here is no mention of the principle of equality."

Prior to 1981, Canada had no written constitution. Does that mean Canada was not a Western-style democracy before then? Great Britain has no written constitution. Is it not a Western-style democracy?

The absence of a written constitution in Israel has long been ruled by the Supreme Court as being no impediment to the protection of individual human rights. For example, Justice Aharon Barak has written: "In a long line of cases, we decided that one of our basic values is equality. We gave expression to this value by saying equality is a fundamental value ... The need to maintain equality is essential to society and to the social convention upon which it is constructed."

Israel's commitment to democracy and to the values and the principles on which it rests is unassailable. No less an authority than the U.S State Department, not generally considered Israel's friend, has described Israel as "a parliamentary democracy which guarantees by law and respects in practice the civil, political and religious rights of its citizens."

Ironically, Israel's commitment to democracy was confirmed in 1992 by a very unlikely source. Noting Israel's lifelong experience in inculcating immigrants from around the globe into the culture and the ethos of democratic government, UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, asked Israel to send experts to fledgling Third World democracies to teach them the fundamentals of the democratic process.

Of greater concern than Martin's asperities about Israel's legal and political system, however, are his insidious, almost off-handed statements of alleged mistreatment of individuals on religious grounds: "... forms of harassment and even persecution of Christians in Israel cannot be ruled out," and "Jews who convert to Christianity are treated worse than Christians".

Unrefuted, such remarks can foster religious embitterment and create dangerous divides along ecumenical lines. In our view Martin's article was unconscionable journalism. Canadians are entitled to better from the newspaper that promises so much.

An absolute necessity

In an era such as ours, of studies, commissions, panels and conferences on the future of the Jewish people, "continuity" has now become more a buzzword than a rallying cry. But one thing is certain, and confirmed to be so, time and again: education is the only vehicle that can ultimately carry the people.

In this issue, we provide comments upon Jewish education from four unique perspectives: the expert in Jerusalem, the lay leader in the community, the professor at the university and the teacher in the classroom. From their respective vantages, our commentators provide the reader with four different lines of sight, each converging with laser precision into the same diamond-hard centre of commitment and resolve: the absolute necessity of Jewish education.

Separation idea full of hazards

The Rabin/Peres plan of "separating for peace" will lead to war.

This plan is a euphemism for creating a PLO/Hamas state within the current borders of Israel. This state will be unstable, and in all likelihood will continue to be even more violent.

As radical and fundamentalist groups among the Palestinians become more powerful and aggressive, there will be a struggle for control among them and they will attack Jewish settlements as well as Israeli targets within the green line. The plan therefore poses a direct, clear and present danger to the State of Israel.

Even in the best scenario, the creation of a PLO/Hamas state entails the transfer of most, if not all of the Jews who now live within or near the borders of that proposed state. In the worst scenario, there will be a civil war between Jews and Jews, Arabs and Arabs, and Jews and Arabs. This will undoubtedly draw the surrounding Arab states into the conflict, and could lead to a major war in the Middle East.

Assurances that the creation of a PLO/Hamas state will lead to peace have no basis in fact or experience. Except for Mubarak and Hussein, no Arab leader (including Arafat) has renounced his goal to "liberate all of Palestine." Arafat (the "moderate") continues to preach "jihad" (holy war) and extol terrorism.

Retreat in the face of terrorism is a sign of weakness and confusion. That only encourages more violence.

There is an alternative to this self-destructive policy of separation. We can let the Arabs do it for us. Or, we can say "No." If an Arab in Israel does not want to live here, he is free to leave; if they want to stay and live with us in peace, welcome.

If settlements prevent the establishment of a PLO/Hamas state, they are as vital to Israel's survival as the IDF. Abandoning them is not only illogical and cowardly, it could provoke precisely the war we seek to avoid.

Don't underestimate Transnistria tragedy

Browsing through the last six CJN issues, I note the following error in the Et Cetera column of Jan. 5 (Montreal edition), under "Transnistria Survivors." The number of Jews deported to Transnistria is listed as 150,000. Yet the historical sources I have consulted indicate that the correct figure is more than double this number.

Historian Martin Gilbert, in his Atlas of the Holocaust tells us that 148,000 Romanian Jews were deported from Bessarabia alone, and a further 144,197 from Bukovina. In addition, between 65,00 and 75,000 Romanian Jews were deported from the regions of Moldova, Muntenia (Old Regat) and that part of Transnistria that remained under Romanian control. These figures are also confirmed in Raul Hilberg's The Destruction of Eastern Europe Jewry.

Regrettably, we know so little about the killing grounds of Transnistria. But I believe that it is crucial that we not underestimate the terrible decimation that occurred there.

Rabin fails to confront Islamic violence

Egypt's foreign minister, Amr Mousa, has astutely admonished Israel for fueling Islamic militant violence by not abiding to the terms of the peace agreement. After all, if political advantage can be gotten by such statements, to which Israel's leaders seem to agree, why not make the case?

When the latest bloodbath occurred weeks ago, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's first statement was that "Israel has to break the cycle of violence." Clearly, Rabin was stating that Israel is part of this cycle and has the capacity to unilaterally alter it. On other occasions, Israel's leaders themselves have said that violence will end only with the fulfilment of the peace arrangements, the very view expressed by Mousa.

But didn't Rabin sign an accord and make commitments before the world that, if carried out, will give the Palestinians everything they want, including East Jerusalem itself, disclaimers notwithstanding? And how do we explain the festive joy in Gaza after the slaughter of two weeks ago, and the polls in Gaza and the West Bank where more than 50 per cent of Arabs express support for ongoing terrorism?

As a matter of fact, the violence against Israel by Islamic militants is not about Israel failing to meet peace terms. It is about Israel, and an agreement that gives credence to its existence. When more than 50 per cent of Rabin's peace partners support ongoing violence, they may be expressing, as columnist William Safire has pointed out, a view quite separate from the issue of the pace of peace arrangements.

With the World Trade bombing trial looming and American opinion against the militants, Rabin had a golden opportunity to confront the Islamic violence that has plagued Israel and may yet take hold of the Palestine Rabin will help establish. Instead, Rabin chose, uncharacteristically, to turn Israel's other cheek and say we're sorry that we've contributed to this event. We can expect the violence to continue.

On Jewish Education

Parents are teachers' partners

"I am growing weaker from day to day. Dear God, please let me stay alive, spare me from these hellish fires, and I shall devote my life to you by teaching and educating our children, your children. For you know better than I, that without children, and without Jewish education, there is no future for our people, and what future is there for Your Holy Kingdom?"

Irving Eisner

That was the prayer and the promise I uttered more than 50 years ago in Birkenau. Ever since, I have spent my life trying to fulfil that promise. The last 40 years have been in Toronto. I have been a teacher of young children all those years.

Our city is known as an Ir v'eim b'Yisrael, a centre of Jewish culture, blessed with praiseworthy institutions of Jewish life and education. We are privileged to have amongst us great scholars in the religious and secular fields of education, knowledgeable administrators, conscientious teachers, devoted parents, community leaders and lay people to whom Jewish education is a first priority.

Our people are known as the am hasefer, the people of the book. The book which has guided us through the millennia, is the Book of Life, the Torah. The people and the Book must stay united. The Book of Life needs the people and the people needs the Book.

In this small reciprocal phrase is the formula which can bond the Book to its people, and then, the people to its future.

King David, the great poet and psalmist, wrote: "Out of the mouth of children, you dear God have found strength." (Psalm 8).

In these words King David has given us the direction in which to steer the main part of our education effort. The only guarantee for the survival and for the continuation of our people is for our children to have a proper Jewish education. This is the challenge and the task of Jewish education in the next years. But it seems to me, having watched generations of children pass through the classroom, that the task is becoming harder from year to year.

Unfortunately, we the teachers have lost our associates, our assistants and our partners in education: We have lost many of our warm Jewish homes. Education used to begin at home around the kitchen table, the dining room and in the living room. Parents were also teachers, and their homes provided supportive Jewish environments for the lessons in the classroom. The home represented warmth, love, unity and friendship.

But times have changed. The home has become a house, a plain structure, a stop off. For reasons too numerous to mention, parents are unable or unwilling to be partners in their children's education. Indeed, in many cases, it appears that children are now ruling the parents. Parents seem more focused on rights than responsibilities, on entitlements rather than contributions, on acquisition rather than sacrifice, on convenience rather than on commitment.

As a result, the entire weight of Jewish education and guidance must be borne solely by the school. And without the supporting foundation of the home, it is unlikely that any school, even the very best, can bear the entire burden.

In the years to come, this then will be the main challenge faced by teachers and educators: to help restore the former partnership between school and home and to help shore up the foundation that used to be in the home for our beloved children and their parents.

To give us the necessary strength I quote the words of Malachi (chapter 3):

"Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet . . .
And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children,
And the heart of the children to their fathers."

Bringing more children into fold

For the past few years, Jewish continuity has been placed high on the Jewish communal agenda and has been the topic of much concern, analysis and debate. Federations of Jewish communities and their agencies, Jewish schools and educational institutions, synagogues and, most important, the Jewish family, must, both individually and collectively, redirect their creative efforts and resources to develop in every Jew the knowledge and commitment to Judaism that will ensure an everlasting bond to the Jewish people, its beliefs and values.

Robert Zittrer

Several recent studies indicate a strong correlation between Jewish education and adult Jewish behavior. The comments and ideas expressed below are based on the premise that Jewish education is a powerful vehicle for developing Jewish identity.

First, the statement "Jewish Education is the right of every Jewish child" must be translated into action. From a financial viewpoint, it is essential to make the cost of Jewish education affordable, even attractive, to the middle class, who feel squeezed from every direction, and are reluctant to either compromise their standard of living or request financial help.

From an educational viewpoint, the challenge is to enable all Jewish children , regardless of intellectual capacity, to attend a Jewish school. More specifically, a major challenge is to make available in more day schools adaptive curricular options that are responsive to children who can manage effectively in a public school but who cannot cope with the pressures of a day school's trilingual or quadrilingual course load.

Another major challenge is to bring more children into the fold of Jewish education. In Montreal, new recruitment efforts should be made to attract to day and supplementary schools a significant number of the 45 per cent of the school age population who currently receive no Jewish education.

The role of the family in Jewish education is critical. Participation of parents in meaningful family education programs enhances the educational experience of the children and delivers a clear message of unity of purpose between the home and the school.

Israel experience programs have been the focus of much attention and funding in recent years. These programs must become more affordable. Furthermore, the content offered in Israel and the follow-up programs upon return can make these experiences even more powerful.

What can we do during the years of schooling to ensure that young Jews will be proud Jews; that they will continue their encounter with Jewish texts throughout their lives; that they will conduct their lives according to Jewish beliefs and practices; that they will attend synagogues; that they will care passionately about their fellow Jews and be involved in the organized Jewish community, helping others who are less fortunate and at the same time building a strong Jewish community; that they will care about the State of Israel and feel part of its destiny; and that they ultimately will build a new family unit that will replicate these values.

Finally, nothing can be done unless appropriate personnel — teachers, principals, lay and professional leadership — are available for both the traditional and the newly-emerging transformative fields of Jewish education.

One possible approach could be a special recruitment campaign at an early age, even at the high school level, to convince students to choose Jewish education as a career. Sizeable scholarships and incentives should be made available to attract such young people.

Jewish studies needed in university curriculum

In these days of lean and mean everyone of us is being challenged to examine what we do and how we do it. Are we providing the services most required? And are they being delivered to those who most need them? But with regard to the question at hand, there is an easy answer: "Everyone needs Jewish studies in the university curriculum." The reasons are several.

Michael Brown

First of all, the university needs Jewish Studies. No person in the modern world can be considered educated without knowing something about Judaism, one of the building blocks of our society. The great books of Western culture which everyone must study to be "educated," include Jewish books, most especially the Bible, but others, as well.

Some contemporary scholars have a more pluralistic, less text-centred vision of the university curriculum, and promote newer fields such as ethnic, gender, class and race studies. But their curriculum, too, must include Jewish studies. Jews are one of the world's oldest and most interesting living ethnic-national groups. And they occupy a prominent place in any reasoned discussion of race, class and gender.

Not long ago, most university people would have disagreed with this assessment. For centuries, in fact, Jewish Studies, if it was to be found at all in the university, existed as the handmaiden of Christian Studies. Jews and Judaism were almost invariably presented as a dead civilization that paved the way for Christianity. And almost nowhere, were Jews allowed to teach about their own culture (or about anything else, since anti-Semitism ensured that faculty appointments would be denied to all but a very few Jews). Jewish students — and scholars — rightly felt demeaned. All students' horizons were being artificially narrowed.

Since World War II, the university in North America has opened up a great deal. Jews and other once ignored groups — and Judaism and other non-Christian religions — have increasingly gained their rightful place in the curriculum beside WASPs and Christianity. That they belong there is now recognized by most university people, certainly in North America. The new presence is a sign of the university's having come closer to its own ideal of universality. To Jews and non-Jews alike it is an assertion of Jewish equality.

Jews need Jewish Studies for other reasons. For some, a Jewish Studies major is the stepping stone to a career. In my 27 years at York, I have taught a not inconsiderable number of students who went on to become professionals in the Jewish world: scholars, rabbis (Orthodox, Conservative and Reform), teachers (especially in the Toronto Jewish schools), communal workers. For some of them, university studies served to broaden and deepen already firm commitments. Others "discovered" Judaism at university. None, it is safe to say, would be as effective in their jobs — dealing with students, congregants, and clients, almost all of whom are university educated — if they had been denied the opportunity to take Jewish Studies courses in their undergraduate years.

Most of those who take Jewish Studies courses, even majors, do not become Jewish professionals. For them, Jewish Studies serves other functions. North American Jewry is one of the most highly educated communities in the world. The overwhelming majority of Jews completes at least one university degree; many take advanced degrees. As a group, they tend to be sophisticated and knowledgeable about the world.

Most, however, have had only a rudimentary Jewish education. As Jews, they have not acquired the intellectual tools and the knowledge to match their accomplishments in their other endeavors. Imagine a computer programmer whose computer and mathematics training stopped in Grade 10! A physician whose study of the sciences stopped in Grade 8! Or a lawyer with only the reasoning skills acquired in Grade 6!

Being able to engage Judaism and the Jewish experience at university, as one engages other cultures and philosophies, is to discover that they are at least as compelling and complex, at least as worthy of mature consideration as any other. And that is a valuable lesson for the advanced student of Judaism, no less than for the beginner.

So who needs Jewish Studies in the university? We all do: the university; our open, pluralistic Canadian society; Jewish community professionals and leaders; and the rank and file members of the Jewish community. Jewish Studies programs are an important resource and a means of enrichment for all.

Opinions

A fateful letter

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Readers of these columns are aware that for the last few months, I have interspersed my regular thoughts on current affairs with personal memories of the past. Moving from one locale to another inevitably means coming across memorabilia of whose existence you have been only dimly aware, and when they confront you they have their special force.

That is the way with an original letter I discovered amongst my effects. It had been written in early 1935 by Dr. Julian Morgenstern, president of Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, America's oldest rabbinical seminary. Addressed to the president of the Berlin Seminary, Rabbi Leo Baeck, its first and last pages are missing. It was apparently a three-page missive, but I do have page 2 — and that is the part which concerns me.

Rabbi Baeck had been a visiting professor at Hebrew Union College in years past, and the two men knew each other well. Here is an excerpt from Morgenstern's letter:

The second project which I have to lay before you today, and which I am sure will prove equally interesting to you, is to inform you and through you, the other members of the Faculty of the Hochschule fur die Wissenschaft des Judentums that the Faculty and Board of Governors of the Hebrew Union College have expressed their willingness to admit to the ranks of its students a number of capable and promising young German students who are now preparing for the Rabbinate in Germany, but who may desire, for one reason or other, to continue their studies at the Hebrew Union College. This action of the authorities of the Hebrew Union College is governed by the following conditions:

The number of these students for the academic year 1935-1936 must not exceed five. They must first be properly accredited by responsible authorities, preferably yourself and your associates in the Faculty of the Hochschule. Their applications for admission to the College must be accompanied by a full statement of both their academic and their specifically Jewish preparation to date, likewise by a certificate of good health from a responsible physician and a responsible dentist. Their applications should be presented, if at all possible, not later than May 15. And they in turn, should present themselves in person for examination upon Oct. 9, 1935.

Such students, regularly admitted, will enjoy the privilege of residence in the Hebrew Union College dormitory free of all costs, and likewise will have the privilege of participating in our established system of student self-support, so that they would be enabled, through the cooperation of the college, to earn whatever funds they may need to supplement their room and board in the dormitory. They must be or have been bona fide German citizens.

If these conditions can be satisfied, we shall be happy indeed to admit, as I said, up to five such students next fall. They will be admitted in whatever class of the Hebrew Union College we find them most adequately prepared for, and will be permitted to continue their studies at the Hebrew Union College under the conditions described above, for so long as they desire to remain here, and of course pending satisfactory conduct, until they shall have completed their preparation for the Rabbinate.

What would come after that, of course cannot be determined now. But they must understand that they would be subject to the immigration laws of the United States of America. We shall be happy indeed to hear from you and your colleagues with regard to this matter at your earliest opportunity, so that we may in turn make our plans accordingly.

Rabbi Baeck followed up the Morgenstern letter by calling five young men into his study. I was one of them, and he thus made it possible for me to escape the Nazis and find a new life in the free world. I have always been immensely grateful to the rabbi and to Hebrew Union College.

'Apathy alternates with gloom'

Government facelift could boost peace

By Yehavahu Ahuv

Disheartened by difficulties, harassed by opponents, the signatories to the Oslo accord are again facing a critical impasse. The optimism of 18 months ago was of short duration. The breakthrough was poorly handled, so that even the difficulties encountered in the partial implementation of the agreement revived old prejudices and deepened mutual distrust. And as Islamic terrorism escalated and hatred got stronger, the hopes for peace shrunk rapidly.

The leaders have not openly given up, but their steps to rescue their promises from total collapse were hesitant and insecure. Chairman Yasser Arafat did not convince the Israeli public that he can be relied upon to control his extremists. It does not matter if this is because he is inept or did not try too hard, or because his constituency in Gaza, collectively punished in response to Islamic terror, blames him for their miserable conditions.

In the Israeli camp too, where apathy alternates with gloom, optimism is a rarity. Nor were people encouraged by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's remark to a Russian emissary, that his public support had fallen drastically. Though one can sense the diminishing confidence in the peace process, no local pollster has ever come out with such a depressing finding.

If indeed Rabin said and believes what was attributed to him, the question arises whether the prime minister is not in fact more discouraged than the public when he deals with Arafat and, for that matter, with President Hafez al-Assad of Syria. It is unclear whether Rabin was just dramatizing his own internal problems, or whether he was sending a message to Moscow, which is now looking for a proper role in the Middle East and is about to send its foreign minister to the area.

Rabin's enthusiasm for the Oslo blueprint was muted from the very start, but he fully endorsed it. He maintained his firm views on what risks Israel's security can or cannot take in the evolving process. This attitude earned him the criticism of his leftist opponents for excessive intransigence vis-a-vis the Arabs and the attacks of the right-ist camp that accused him of compromising Israel's future.

He has proved to be more vulnerable to the accusations of the latter. During the 18 months of negotiations, the peace process was repeatedly interrupted — mainly in the wake of Arab terrorist attacks — and was more than once reanimated by the imaginative tactics of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, whose vision of a "New Middle East" still determines his actions.

Peres firmly believes in the necessity to maintain the dialogue, even under the worst circumstances and at almost any cost and this makes him the primary target of right-ist attack. But so far he has carried the prime minister with him from one summit to the other. The encounters are becoming much more frequent. Their lasting effect is uncertain, but by keeping the momentum alive, however artificially, they have probably saved the process from total collapse.

The Clinton administration has many international problems on its agenda and the Mideast imbroglio is not the most dramatic of the long list and is also less controversial in the new political set-up in Washington. As there is no real substitute for America's role in the region, U.S. activism will presumably be more visible as a result of the present impasse.

The recent deterioration of the public mood in Israel does not alter the unrecognized but basic fact that Israel was never in a better position to shape its future. The Arab environment is now clearly divided between those who seek accommodation by compromise and those who are conspiring against it. The two trends are as active in the Arab camp as they are in Israel, only the methods are different.

To desert the struggle for peace because of sporadic terrorism, however painful, gives terrorists full satisfaction. If the struggle will not be won by the realists, if the forces of peace will be intimidated by the extremists in their respective camps, the chances for change will at best be frozen, but more likely plunge the region into a sequence of local or even wider hostilities and all the dividends already won by the initial steps will be lost in the uncertainty of instability.

Israel holds the better cards; in fact, probably all the cards, but only if it can play them judiciously. True, the present government has an uncomfortable parliamentary basis, but this cannot be helped without major risks to the peace effort. There are also petty power struggles in the government which are very disturbing. Rabin and Peres, the old rivals now jointly engaged in their peace efforts, must soon present to the public a refurbished government by giving it a persuasive facelift. Otherwise the opportunities which they themselves have created will be lost by their own inaction.

The papyrus, please

By Allan Gould

The Academy Awards are soon upon us, not unlike the Ten Plagues, but with one key difference: There were a limited number of plagues, whereas the number of award shows seem to be infinite. Well, over 20 years ago, a gifted writer and movie producer friend, Victor Solnicki, suggested the following idea.

Host: Welcome, everyone, to the annual Halo Awards. As you all know, Halo stands for the Heavenly Academy of Laudable Orations. (He holds up the statuette, which looks like a bagel on the end of a stick, attached to a tiny stand). The Halo, as you know, is given for the Best Accomplishment in various fields of performance, production and writing, in the Holy Bible. To present our first Halo — a woman whose name has become synonymous with passion and excitement — and who won the Halo for Hairstyling in last year's presentations — please welcome . . . Delilah!

Delilah: Thank you, uh, Aaron. Without any hesit . . . uh, any pause, I'd like to award the first Halo for Best Costume. The nominees are. . .

Joseph's Coat of Many Colors, from Joey and Our Gang, produced, written and directed by Ha-Shem.

The Breastplate of Aaron, the High Priest, from I am G-d's Co-Pilot, produced, written and directed by Ha-Shem.

Uh, er, may I have the papyrus, please? (Delilah is handed a little scroll, which she fearfully unravels. Suddenly, Delilah breaks into an excited, silly grin — very breathless) And the winner is — Joseph! For his many-colored coat!

Joseph: Gosh! I never dreamed that I'd win this! Well, I'd sure like to thank my dad, Jacob, for giving me this wonderful, colorful coat! And I really do love it, although it sure caused me a lot of heartache and problems with my brothers. I know what it's like to be in the pits, so it sure is great to get all this recognition from my peers. And I'd like to thank my agent. Pharoah, who had faith in me when no one else did. And back home — to my two sons, Menashe and Ephraim — bless you both!

(Joseph turns to leave the podium, clutching his Halo, when he bumps into the very sexy Delilah. He looks at her disapprovingly, turns away and spits, and stomps off-stage, angrily. The stage microphones pick him up mumbling, "First Mrs. Potiphar, now this!")

Delilah: (Returning to the podium, obviously shaken by Joseph's physical beauty, although clearly hurt by his rejection.) To present the next Halo, for Special Effects, I'd like you all to welcome one of my favorite people — a man whose life seemed so tame and forgettable until he became truly "revolting" ... that's right, the fellow who showed us all how one can truly get swallowed up in a role, if you play it right — ladies and gentlemen, may I present: Korach!

The Lost Tribes of Israel

Sheldon Kirshner was recently in Jerusalem to examine the mythology of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Thirty-five years ago, Rabbi Eliyahu Avihayil attended a lecture that profoundly changed his life. After hearing a mesmerizing presentation about the so-called Ten Lost Tribes of Israel, the Orthodox rabbi changed his priorities — focusing on tracking down what he claims are the dispersed remnants of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel.

"Everyone has a goal in life," he said. "This one is mine."

Since then, Rabbi Avihayil has delved into that myth-shrouded topic with child-like fervor. And he has dispatched emissaries to distant lands to seek out long-estranged Jews, imbue them with Judaism and encourage some of them to settle in Israel. Furthermore, he has written two books on the subject — The Tribes of Israel and The Lost Tribes of Assyria.

Rabbi Avihayil, a teacher of Bible and Judaism at a boys' college, heads a Jerusalem-based movement called Amishav (My People Returns). He founded Amishav in 1975 with the encouragement of Yitzhak Ben Zvi, the late president of Israel; Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook, the late spiritual leader of the Merkaz Harav yeshiva; and the Jewish Agency.

Amishav conducts research on the Ten Lost Tribes, initiates contact with their putative descendants and assists those who wish to rejoin the Jewish people.

In addition, Amishav works with Marranos, who were "lost" during the period of forced conversions to Christianity in Spain and Portugal in the 15th century.

Although some find Rabbi Avihayil's theory about the Ten Lost Tribes rather farfetched and implausible, he is convinced that he is on the right track.

More than 2,700 years ago, the Assyrians conquered the northern Kingdom of Israel, taking into captivity the tribes of Reuben, Menashe, Simeon, Issachar, Zevulun, Dan, Ephraim, Naphtali, Asher and Gad.

As might be expected, the story of the Ten Lost Tribes has stirred the imagination of Jews and non-Jews alike for centuries.

In Talmudic literature, the Ten Lost Tribes are to be found beyond the Sambatyon River, an impassable body of water far from Israel which ceases to flow on the Sabbath.

And in biblical lore, their saga is pronounced. A passage from Isaiah refers to the "remnant which is left of His people from Assyria..." In Ezekiel, it is written: "I will take the people of Israel from the nations among which they have gone, and will gather them from all sides and bring them to their own land; and I will make them one nation..."

Toward the end of the 19th century, writes Israeli historian Eli Eyal, legends and rumors about the Ten Lost Tribes began to seep into modern Yiddish and Hebrew literature, appearing in the works of writers like Sholem Aleichem, S.Y. Agnon and Mendele Mokher Seforim.

The Ten Lost Tribes exerted a fascination on Christians as well. Various Christian denominations sought out the supposed progeny of the Ten Lost Tribes, believing that their conversion to Christianity would hasten the arrival of the millennium.

By Rabbi Avihayil's reckoning, there are about 40 million people around the globe today with Jewish blood coursing through their veins. Among them are Muslims and Christians in Afghanistan, Pakistan, India, China, Mynamar (Burma), Spain, Brazil and Mexico. Presumably, a high proportion are descended from the Ten Lost Tribes.

Asked how one recognizes descendants of the Ten Lost Tribes and of Marranos, he replied: "They observe some rites of Judaism, or maintain certain Jewish names."

As he sees it, the largest agglomeration of "lost" Jews are the Pathans of Afghanistan and Pakistan, numbering 15 to 20 million.

The Pathans, who are Sunni Muslims, supposedly bear a physical resemblance to Jews, wear earlocks and a kind of tallis, circumcise their sons on the eighth day, refrain from mixing meat and milk products, marry under a chupah and light candles on the Sabbath. Moreover, menstruating Pathan women use mikvahs, and a Pathan sub-tribe, the Jaji, wear amulets with a Shema Yisrael inscription.

Words with Hebrew antecedants have crept into the Pathans' language — karka (ground), kalae (community), baracha (ceremony), for example.

"And," Rabbi Avihayil added, "they have surnames of Israel — Reuben/Raban, Ephraim/Afrid, Asher/Asheri."

To date, not a single Pathan has immigrated to Israel or converted to Judaism. But Amishav has sent representatives to the Pathans, while Rabbi Avihayil corresponds with a Pakistani Pathan who has written two books about the Pathans' alleged connection with the Ten Lost Tribes.

"Our objective is to convert some dozens (of Pathans) to Judaism, bring them to Israel and send them back to start a Jewish community."

Rabbi Avihayil emphatically denies that he has a hidden agenda — to ingather millions of Pathans in Israel. "That's nonsense."

The Pathans nowithstanding, Amishav has also established contact with the seven million Kashmiris of India, the 100,000 Cananites of India, the 250,000 Chiangs of western China and the eight million Karins, the two million Shans and the one million Shinleungs (or Menashe) of India and Mynamar.

Members of the Kashmiris, Cananites, Chiangs, Karins and Shans have neither converted nor settled in Israel. However, 150 Menashes from the Kerala and Mizoram districts of India have come to Israel as tourists with the option of converting and making aliyah. Several Menashe have embraced Judaism, including one young man with a kippah who visited Rabbi Avihayil during my visit.

Rabbi Avihayil claims there are 5,000 Menashe in India who have rejected Christianity and practise Judaism. "I began hearing about this group 25 years ago. Some have sent their children to Jewish schools in Bombay."

In due course, Rabbi Avihayil hopes to bring 50 more Menashe to Israel. They will be formally converted, schooled in Judaism and left with the choice of remaining in Israel or returning to India to strengthen their community.

"We believe that in the future all the Menashe will become Jews. We'll help them."

He scoffs at suggestions that thousands, maybe millions, of Indians claiming Jewish descent will converge on Israel under the Law of Return.

Last year, to much publicity, Israel's ambassador to India issued precisely such a warning. As a result, the long-running "Who is a Jew" debate in Israel was reignited, while Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin proposed changes in the Law of Return (which extends immigration rights to any person with a single Jewish grandparent).

Rabbi Avihayil, whose organization is dependent on private donations for sustenance, has also reached out to Marranos, Jews forcibly converted to Christianity during and after the Inquisititon.

In Portugal, there are upwards of 1,000 candidates for conversion to Judaism, out of an estimated 500,000 Portuguese believed to be descended from Marranos. A handful have immigrated to Israel, joining 150 former Marranos from Peru and 100 from Mexico who immigrated earlier.

In the northeastern Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Norte, Rabbi Avihayil knows of at least 100 Marranos who wish to convert. The first wave of these Marranos is already in Israel.

Rabbi Avihayil contends that Brazil is of crucial importance to Amishav because, as he believes, one out of ten Brazilians are of Marrano origin. If he is right, Amishav will have its work cut out for it for decades to come.

Mideast Analysis
By Sheldon Kirshner

Settlements a flashpoint

By the terms of Israel's September 1993 Declaration of Principles with the PLO, negotiations on the final status of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are scheduled to start in 1996.

In reality, the battle has already begun, without a single negotiating session having taken place.

The most recent flashpoint in this struggle occurred in the West Bank settlement of Efrat, adjacent to the Palestinian village of Al-Khader, when settlers tried to expand its boundaries and met with Arab resistance.

As elsewhere in the territories, the dispute turned on land ownership — the crux of Israel's long conflict with the Palestinians. It was a microcosm of the increasingly bitter debate over the ultimate disposition of the territories.

It is not a simple matter, touching as it does on Israel's quest for security, the settlers' desire to maintain Israeli control over the contested lands, and the PLO's demand for self-determination.

Last month, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin declared that settlements "add nothing, absolutely nothing, to Israel's security." This remark was consistent with his 1992 decision to freeze all government-funded residential construction in the territories and with his position that territorial compromise should be an essential component of any peace agreement with the Arabs.

But when it comes to settlements, there are other factors to consider. Until recently, Rabin did not stand in the way of private construction in the territories. And he distinguished between settlements vital to Israel's security and those that are not.

Due to the conflicting strands in Rabin's policy, more than 3,000 new homes have been built in the West Bank and Gaza since the Labor government assumed office in July 1992.

The policy has satisfied no one. The settlers have been thrown into a state of uncertainty. The Palestinians are wrathful that Israel is gobbling up land and violating the spirit of the Oslo agreement. Israelis who support Rabin's efforts at rapprochement with the Arabs complain that settlements undermine the very peace process the government is promoting.

Although Rabin has infuriated just about everyone by refusing to spell out his vision of territorial compromise, it seems clear that he is driven by certain priorities.

It would appear that Rabin wants to create a ring of Jewish housing around greater Jerusalem so that its status as Israel's indivisible capital cannot be practically challenged. In addition, he wishes to retain the Etzion bloc west of Bethlehem and parts of western Samaria.

To a degree, Rabin's putative plan conforms with a monograph written by Israeli scholar Joseph Alpher, who believes that Israel should annex about 11 percent of the West Bank, with 70 percent of its Jewish population. On paper, the scheme seems plausible. But in all likelihood, the Palestinians will not buy it.

The Law of Babysitting

The consequences of a "guilty finding" under Ontario's Child and Family Services Act are a fine of not more than $1,000.00 and the possibility that the court could ultimately take the children away or impose supervision on the parents by a local Children's Aid Society. It is part of something called a "child protection proceeding". If the children were taken away, they could become either wards of a local family and child service or the Government of Ontario and placed into foster homes or group homes.

In discussions with informed sources in both Metropolitan Toronto and in York Region, it appears that every case would be judged upon the circumstances. For example, if a responsible 12 year old were left alone with two smaller children while the parents went out for a few hours, then if the authorities were called because of an accident in the home, they would probably not "charge" anyone with any offense. They would likely reach the parents, have them come home, and help the parents to better understand the limitations of the older child in charge.

However, if the child "in charge" was left to take care of the children and had maliciously caused problems that led to an accident or worse, then the authorities may have some serious questions about the parenting skills of his parents. They might ask why they would have left such an individual alone with the younger children.

In the event that charges were laid under the Child and Family Services Act only, and the fine were imposed, then no criminal conviction would result since the charges were not laid under Canada's Criminal Code. However, as mentioned, a local children's aid society could ask the court either to impose a supervisory order or worse, under which children could be placed in a foster or group home, particularly where the children had been neglected on other occasions or appeared to be in danger by reason of the malicious conduct of a child "in charge".

It is my information that leaving a responsible child at home who is 12 or 13 years of age does not usually lead to charges in the event that the authorities are called to the home, unless there are clear indications of neglect beyond a mere accident and an isolated situation. (For instance, if the authorities walked in and found rotting food and old beer cans strewn throughout the house, with the children in dirty diapers who are wailing and unfed, then their attitude towards charging the parents under these sections might change dramatically.)

Legislation similar to Ontario's exists across Canada in each province.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

A few weeks ago I was having my traditional after shul breakfast with a congregant, and we went through all of the regular discourses of daily life — his business and my schedule. We became involved in discussing the synagogue and the programs that have started, and the countless ideas that run through my mind which never see the light of day.

His becoming somewhat of a regular shul-goer began with the saying of Kaddish for his father, and it worked its way into not only his life, but the fabric of his entire family. Yet for all of his devotion, a doubt loomed within. He paused for a moment and said, "Most of my friends think that I'm out of my mind ... they consider me some religious freak."

I looked at him and quickly asked, "And what do you think of yourself?"

He looked straight at me and told me he's not sure that he believes in G-d. Like all of us, he wants to see a sign or message that G-d is out there lurking in the headlines and roaming the streets with us. We wouldn't be opposed to having Him appear in the middle of Bathurst Street during rush hour. This, we believe, would put our minds to rest. With this knowledge we could then happily go on to live a life that is religious and devoted to G-d.

The rabbis of centuries ago taught us, Hafoch bah vihafoch bah dicoolah bah — Search within It, for all that you need is there (Avot 5:22). This, of course, refers to our Torah. It is this book that contains all of the knowledge that mankind needs. It bears complex scientific formulas and deep historical truisms. It also contains the philosophy everybody needs in order to live.

Last week's Torah portion, Ki Tisa, has Moses confronting the G-d he so desperately needs to see. The beloved tablets that were lovingly brought down from the heights of heaven now lie shattered on the earth's soil. The dream that was has turned into a nightmare.

This revered people have lapsed into everything they weren't supposed to be. As a lost soul in need of direction Moses asks, "Show me Your glory, ... show me who You are, show me You, I need to see."

And G-d replies, "No man can see me and live." This was the answer Moses had to live with.

A beautiful midrash (Yalkut Shimoni), or rabbinic parable, explains this to us. A Roman general approached Rabbi Yehoshua ben Chananya and asked him if there is G-d in this world. The rabbi told him that there was. The general went on to say that if he can't see Him, how can he believe in Him? "Why doesn't G-d appear once or twice a year to convince everyone He's still around?"

The rabbi said the following: "Stand in front of the sun, and tell me what you see."

The Roman laughed, "Who can look at the sun? Who can see it in its entirety?" True, even today no one can stare at the brilliance of the sun's intensity and truly see it all.

The rabbi turned to this general and gently answered, "Do your ears hear what your mouth says? The sun that is one of millions in the universe we cannot see. What of the one G-d in this universe that has created all? How do you expect to gaze upon Him?"

While we shouldn't expect a visit from G-d, we can see Him. Look at the stars, the moon and the sun. Look at the majesty of the world and the universe. Look at the marvel of the human body. Look at the marvel of the survival of the Jewish people, the mystical and profound law that we have been given — and you'll find it difficult to ask, "Where is G-d?"

For He truly is here, there and everywhere.

Dutch couple honored

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

EDMONTON — Members of the Edmonton Jewish community will join Israel vice-consul general Haim Waxman in honoring a Dutch couple, Lewis and Frances Vandermeulen, as Righteous Gentiles.

The ceremony will take place Feb. 26 in Barrhead, Alberta, a small town north of Edmonton where the Vandermeulens live. They are in their late 80s, and not well enough to travel to Edmonton.

Born on May 1, 1942 in Amsterdam, Matteman-Van Roojen was given into the care of a Dutch non-Jewish family by her parents, Abraham and Rebecca Matteman, who went into hiding from the Nazis. She was passed from one family to another and wound up with the Vandermeulens in the autumn of 1943, living with the family until 1947, when she was sent to Australia to live with her only living relative.

She said the Vandermeulen family claimed her as their own child, despite the fact that the neighbors knew she was not related.

The vice-consul general has asked the Edmonton Jewish Federation and Jewish National Fund to encourage members of the Edmonton community to join in the trip to Barrhead.

Centre campaign commences

TORONTO — Aish HaTorah, the international Jewish educational outreach organization, has launched its 100-Day Capital Campaign for the new Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre in Thornhill.

All fundraising efforts for the centre will be completed before the campaign ends May 8. The centre is scheduled to open in late September.

As Aish HaTorah's first permanent location in North America, the facility is meant to serve as a centre of Jewish life, learning and leadership. It will promote and ensure Jewish continuity within the Toronto Jewish community and will fulfil the needs of Jews from a variety of backgrounds.

Aish HaTorah

Leslie Dan, chair of pharmaceutical company Novopharm Ltd., has dedicated the $3-million centre because of his strong belief in Aish HaTorah's goal of rekindling Judaism among all Jews, regardless of their affiliation.

The campaign aims to raise $4.8 million to cover both construction costs and the establishment of a $1.8-million endowment fund for maintenance and program expansion. Roughly $2 million has been raised to date.

Jewish Life

Where pain and numbness meet

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Twenty-one Jewish lives ended in Netanya, Israel a short time ago. The survivors, their family and friends have crossed over to the "other side."

I read in a local publication about the massacre of children in a Rwandan village and how their charred bodies were unrecognizable to their families. I saw the pictures of the people of Chechnya and the amputated bodies of its citizens. And I know their neighbors who remained alive have gone to the other side.

And I remember when my father died and I took my own journey to the other side — that place where the life force seemed to be suspended, and it was as though I was staring back at the world I once knew.

Guest Voices

The other side — where pain and numbness, clarity and darkness and a plethora of other feelings and thoughts mesh together to create a state of awareness fixed more in the heavens than on the earth. That place you will know, if you have been there.

And as I drifted on the other side I remember watching people on the "safe side." I watched them and wondered how it was that they could walk their dog, attend the theatre, or haggle over the price of an automobile. "They are laughing so heartily," I thought, "feeling so alive."

Where did they find it within themseves to color coordinate their pants and shirts? And why couldn't I? I wanted to as well.

Eventually I made it back to the safe side. I was finally able to tuck myself away carefully and safely in a pocket full of the mundane. I again became occupied with the most simplistic and silly of tasks. As I did so, those on the other side began to become alien to my existence.

I couldn't remember what it was like to forget if stripes went with dots.

Later, I met an Ethiopian Jew, a survivor of savagery and death squads and I watched as he went about his new life on the safe side, working in a parking lot booth on Jarvis Street and studying creative writing at night.

He made it back from the other side after seeing the starvation of his cousins and friends in a refugee camp in Sudan. He was able to find the safe side even after that night when he buried them under the light of the moon, quietly, so as not to be caught and beaten for burying a Jew.

Soon after, I watched a survivor of Auschwitz sing and dance at her annual Landsmanschaften meeting and tell funny jokes about her grandchild. She laughed; oh how she laughed. She was safe.

Afterwards she told me about her pregnant sister who had been promised safety in the camp hospital, and of course received the death sentence instead, for her simple desire to create a life. The sister who survived, had known the other side.

I watched them and I remembered my own experience, and I puzzled at how it was that we ever make it back from the other side. And then when we do, how do we immerse ourselves in the commonplace and distance ourselves from the misery and suffering of those on the other side?

Perhaps the answer, or one answer, is that one of the enormous challenges and struggles of life is indeed to claw your way back to the safe side once you have known the other side.

Perhaps our consciousness really never lets go of the anguish we felt on the other side; yet our memory relaxes just enough to fool us, to make us think that we've made it back.

And then when we have, we sort of pretend we were never there. And we do that because what exists there is not easy for humans to consume. It is harsh on the soul's digestive system.

The shock and the agony we experience on the other side is nothing we expected and perhaps nothing which should be of this earth.

And when we do claw our way back, some of us relax our memories more, and some of us less. Perhaps those who aren't as tired remember a little bit better and are able to bring back with them enough of the other side to use it for the betterment of other people's lives.

And others say, enough. Now it is time for me and no one else.

I close my computer, and crawl under my duvet and my dog curls up at my feet. My stomach is warm following my herbal tea and I look forward to tomorrow because right now I am on the safe side.

BioBeam from Israel - The Healing Beam of Light

Advertising Feature

Two revolutionary new products from Israel are now available for the first time in Canada!

Thousands of people in Israel, Europe, South Africa, South America, the Far East and Australia have been successfully using BIOBEAM LIGHT TREATMENT SYSTEMS since 1992 to successfully treat and alleviate pain associated with rheumatological diseases and wound healing.

A Toronto based company, Avroom Medical has secured the Canadian distribution rights for this amazing, proven product that's manufactured in Holon, Israel by Amcor, Israel's leading appliance manufacturer. The company's principals, Howard Tishman and Jack Harrison, plan to launch this product through a distributor network and an extensive advertising program across Canada.

The secret behind BioBeam's effectiveness lies in the type of light it emits. The light is concentrated around a particular wavelength, which stimulates a beneficial natural healing effect at the cellular level. These therapeutic "waves of light" accelerate healing, and provide relief from pain associated with inflammation. This light is known as "soft" or "cold" lasers, and is used throughout the world by the medical profession in treating many ailments.

The BioBeam 940 is used to alleviate rheumatic and rheumatoid arthritis pains, joint problems in the fingers hand and knees and connective tissue disorders.

The second product, BioBeam 660, has proven extremely effective for treating acne, cold sores (herpes), bed sores (decubitus ulcers), and skin ulcers associated with diabetes as well as speeding up the healing process of post-operative wounds.

A professional model that's larger and more powerful is available for Physiotherapists, Chiropractors and others in the medical professions.

Safe & easy to use

The BIOBEAM LIGHT SYSTEM is safe, easy to use, easily portable so you can use it at home, or anywhere. You can try it on a "no-risk" basis for 45 days. Its proven results (making use of the body's natural healing system) have resulted in the tremendous acceptance of the BIOBEAM LIGHT SYSTEMS around the world.

For more information or to order the BIOBEAM 940, or the BIOBEAM 660 LIGHT SYSTEM, please contact Avroom Medical, 3200 Dufferin Street, Suite 205, North York, Ontario, M6A 2T3 or call toll free 1-800-324-8181.

Terrorism discussed

TORONTO — The terrorist activities of Islamic radicals are damaging the Mideast peace process by eroding the image of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin among Israelis as "Mr. Security," and by highlighting Chairman Yasser Arafat's lack of resolve to combat those forces, according to a renowned analyst of Middle Eastern affairs.

Prof. Efraim Inbar, director of the BESA Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University, also said that Arafat would undermine his legitimacy in the territories if he deals harshly with Hamas, a local radical Islamic group.

As for the Israeli prime minister, he said, Rabin's image of security has been vital for the Labor Party in gaining support for the peace process. But Israelis are concerned that if the present government cannot control terrorism, then the advantages of continuing the process are difficult to ascertain.

Inbar's recent talk here was sponsored by the Israel affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, in cooperation with Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and the BESA Centre, which is dedicated to the memory of Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat.

"The peace process is perceived as an anathema to the Islamic radicals because it is U.S.-sponsored, and they hate the Americans almost as much as the Israelis," he said. "The fundamentalists perceive the West in general, and the United States specifically, as competition for world hegemony. Israel is seen as an extension of Western ideology in the Mideast, thus giving extra motivation for their hatred of Israel as well."

The political science professor said the radical organizations have "ideological problems" with Israel because it is located in what is viewed as the area of daar Islam (the world of Islam).

Jihad (holy war) and the concept of shahid (martyrdom) provide justification for their terrorism against Israel and others, said Inbar. "These radical groups are able to explain temporary setbacks because they believe history is on their side and ultimately they will win out."

Inbar said Islamic radicals pose a threat to the peace process and attempt to provoke Israel to take harsh measures in reaction to terrorist acts within Israel, thus further stymying the process.

Twins celebrate 90 years of togetherness

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Twin sisters Esther Broverman and Sonia Gorstein celebrated a special birthday on Jan. 15.

The sisters, both residents of the Sharon Home, turned 90. At the birthday lunch, 29 of their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren came to help them celebrate.

Among the out-of-towners were Broverman's sons from her first marriage, Allan and Martin Kolinsky, who came from Calgary and Birmingham, England, respectively.

The twins, Esther and Sonia Peremislov (Promislow in Canada), were born in 1905 in the Russian town of Pavolitch. After the early death of their father, they came with their mother to Winnipeg in 1921 to join other family members.

While Gorstein has lived in Winnipeg all her adult life, Broverman and her first husband operated stores in rural Saskatchewan until the 1930s, when they settled in Regina.

"After my father died in 1961, we moved to Winnipeg," Allan Kolinsky recalled. "My grandmother was still here and we had numerous cousins. We lived near Auntie Sonia who was a great cook. When I came home late some evenings, her lights would still be on at 1 a.m. I would go and visit and she would feed me."

Gorstein is wheelchair bound and has lived in the Sharon Home, Winnipeg's Jewish personal care centre, since 1986. Broverman had been living independently with her husband of 22 years, Hymie Broverman, in a south Winnipeg apartment until a few months ago.

While she is still physically healthy, she does not hear well and is beginning to show signs of Alzheimer's disease.

For the Sharon Home, whose staff catered the party, the twin sisters' birthday luncheon was one of the few times that a party with non-residents has ever been held.

The Sharon Home's new director, former Torontonian Daniel Ruth, said he hopes there will be more such happy events celebrated with family members and friends in the future.

Casino night kicks off camp alumni reunion

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A B'nai Brith Camp Alumni reunion planned for the summer in Kenora, Ont., was kicked off here Jan. 28 with a casino night and auction that attracted 240 people.

"We wanted a program that would appeal to all age groups over 18," said alumni association chair Murray Gilfix.

The association, formed last spring, has planned a reunion weekend for August 18 to 20 in Kenora.

Camp BB, as it is popularly known, was incorporated in 1919 just north of Winnipeg Beach. In 1953, camp directors leased Town Island from the town of Kenora in northwestern Ontario, 200 km away.

"This camp has played an important role in the lives of Winnipeggers and ex-Winnipeggers," said alumni weekend chair Bob Axelrod. "We have alumni whose children and grandchildren attended the camp as both campers and staff."

Axelrod said planners have received inquiries from alumni from as far away as San Francisco, New York and every major city in Canada.

Contact people are in place in most major Canadian cities for further details and registration information. For Toronto and Montreal, the contact people are Jodi Klapman (905-731-2262) and Shari Slonim (416-447-6094).

Arrangments have been made for a special weekend rate at the Best Western Lakeside Inn in Kenora for those alumni who prefer hotel accommodations to staying at the camp.

School funding, Quebec discussed at CJC meeting

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada to hear an appeal offers "some comfort and hope" to the advocates of funding for Jewish religious schools in Ontario, the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region executive was told recently.

"We consider it to be good news," said Edward M. Morgan, the region's honorary legal counsel. "In this case there is a particular significance in allowing the appeal."

Morgan said he is also hopeful because there are now seven new members out of nine on the bench which turned down the original request.

"The government hasn't budged one inch since the case was last heard," Morgan added.

He guessed that the appeal would not be heard until late 1995.

The fact that the appeal has been granted "should give pause to the other side," said Murray A. Segal, chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education. He said the association will lobby all candidates and political leaders in the coming provincial election.

Dealing with the referendum situation in Quebec, the executive heard a report from Congress national director Jack Silverstone. "The Jewish community of Quebec is not frightened, it has not panicked, we've been living with this for 20 years, and we're confident of the outcome."

It is an obligation of Congress to continue its fight to have war criminals prosecuted, the national director said. "We cannot accept that the criminal code amendments are null and void because of the Finta decision. Congress does not agree with the federal justice department's view that the amendments are not enforcible.

The government's decision to deport four alleged war criminals "is a positive action and shows some movement in its position," he said.

"The government has failed us by saying to us that their resources are too scarce to prosecute," said Louis Lenkinski, vice-chair of the Ontario Human Rights Commission. "The ministers involved did not even have the decency to be present when their officials made the announcement."

Vancouver federation reviews fundraising

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The most daunting challenge facing the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver is the "reinventing and renewing" of its fundraising structure, said the newly appointed president.

Malcolm Weinstein succeeded Peter Oreck on Feb. 6 for a two-year term.

"Federation must set an example for our children of how adults can work collaboratively together, while honoring their diverse backgrounds and interests, to make the best use of the community as a human and financial resource," Weinstein said in his inaugural speech.

The 1994 Combined Jewish Appeal campaign raised $4,155,082, with another $500,000 in pledges perhaps still to come. The 1993 campaign raised just under $4 million.

Close to 300 volunteers were involved in the campaign, which for the first time emphasized a marketing strategy. A community calendar was distributed to all 1993 donors and to new members of the Lower Mainland community, and large outdoor billboards were put up at 11 key Jewish locations.

Federation officials have reported that the endowment fund grew to just under $2.5 million in August. They aim to boost the fund to $25 million by the year 2000 in order to continue supporting Israel program scholarships, Jewish schools and community organizations like the one started last year in White Rock-Surrey.

Federation's allocation last year to the United Israel Appeal was $1,267,329. Local constituent agencies received $1,152,230.

Canadian Jewish Congress got $266,634, with $5,750 for its Pacific region. The largest allocation, $302,940, went to the Talmud Torah. The Jewish Community Centre received $271,400.

Executive director Drew Staffenberg told The CJN the federation's major challenge is serving the great influx of newcomers to Vancouver. "They're coming from everywhere," he said.

THE MORRIS M. PULVER SCHOLARSHIP FUND OF ISRAEL

is pleased to announce

APPLICATIONS ARE NOW AVAILABLE FOR THE 1995-96 ACADEMIC YEAR

For undergraduate, graduate and post-graduate students who are Canadian citizens in need of financial aid and who are eligible to attend recognized institutions of higher learning in Israel as designated by the Council of Higher Education in Israel.

The Council for Higher Education is the state institution responsible for higher education in Israel. The Council's authority derives from the Council of Higher Education Law - 1958.

The fund is administered on the basis of the dictates of the will of the late Morris M. Pulver which states:

"The total residue of my estate ... shall be used to provide scholarships in Israel to students who ... have excellent scholarship capabilities and who are in need of this type of financial aid and who are eligible to attend recognized institutions of higher learning in Israel."

Universities

Bar Ilan University, Ben Gurion University, Haifa University, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, The Open University of Israel, Technion, Tel Aviv University, Weizmann Institute

Other Institutions of Higher Education

Bezalel Academy, Jerusalem College of Technology, Michlalah-Jerusalem College for Women, Rubin Academy, Shenkar College, Association of Regional Colleges

USY student keeps a hectic schedule

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's Wednesday night, 11 p.m., and Elise Levinoff's day isn't over yet.

The Thornhill teen, a Grade 12 student who was elected in December to the international executive of United Synagogue Youth (USY), is on the phone with a CJN reporter discussing her new position.

Levinoff, the only Canadian on this year's executive, has put in a full day at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), not to mention doing homework, and has already spoken earlier in the evening to USY counterparts in California and New Jersey.

In her "spare" time, the former competitive swimmer serves as co-layout editor on the CHAT yearbook committee and teaches Sunday school at Adath Israel Congregation, where she was USY chapter president last year.

In addition to her new international position, Levinoff is regional communications vice-president for ECRUSY (Eastern Canadian Region USY), the only fully Canadian USY region, which encompasses Toronto, Hamilton, London, St. Catharines and Ottawa. (Communities elsewhere in Canada are included in nearby American regions.) She is a former USY chapter president and a former editor of the USY newsletter for chapter presidents.

As international communications vice-president, Levinoff oversees the production of the Conservative youth organization's newsletter Achshav!, an issues-oriented quarterly with a distribution of 13,000, co-edited by two members in New Jersey. "USY is a very spread out organization," explains Levinoff, whose mandate of "keeping the ties going on within USY" covers the entire organization in North America and Israel.

Elise Levinoff

She is in touch with regional communications vice-presidents in the 17 North American regions and is in computer contact with about 70 USYers through the Internet.

Levinoff's involvement with the organization began shortly after her bat mitzvah when she accompanied her older brother Aaron to a Shabbaton.

"I was very intimidated because I was Aaron's little sister, but I was made to feel very welcome and that's why I stayed," says Levinoff.

The depth of her involvement stems from "the challenge of knowing I'm changing a lot of people's lives by making them understand the importance of Conservative Judaism and Jewish living." The teenage years are important ones in terms of Jewish continuity, she stresses.

On a more mundane but not unimportant note are the fun and friendship at USY, Levinoff adds.

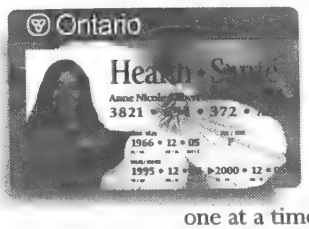
Over the next few years, if you're an Ontario adult eligible for OHIP, you'll be asked to register for the new photo Health Card.

When you come in and smile for the camera you'll be doing your part to prevent $65 million in health care fraud each year.



You'll get your notice in the mail when it's your turn to register. So please, wait for your personal notice.

Taking the time to register all 11 million people in Ontario – one at a time – is the best way to remove counterfeit and invalid cards from our system. For more information, look for Your Guide to Ontario's Photo Health Card in your mail.

Free Loan Cassa volunteer honored for dedication

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — David Goldberg, a volunteer for the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa (G'milath Chasodim Association) was honored recently at the agency's annual dinner at the Lipa Green Building.

Anne Golden of the United Way paid tribute to Goldberg for his "dedication to volunteerism in the Jewish community."

Golden said the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa's mission has always been to help people help themselves, an act that Maimonides taught is the highest form of tzedakah. She congratulated the Free Loan Cassa for 72 years of outstanding work.

Golden also praised Bert Cohen, who served as a United Way Allocation panelist.

She paid tribute to the late Gabriel Alter who was a devoted volunteer of the Cassa and an active United Way volunteer. Debby Alter received a citation in memory of her husband, thanking the organization for "helping make Gabe's retirement a happy time for him."

Goldberg's daughter, Karen, spoke of her father's accomplishments as a volunteer and praised him for his dedication to the Jewish community. She said her father has been an inspiration to his family and friends, and she announced the establishment of the David Goldberg Endowment Fund.

Nathan Disenhouse, president of the Cassa, presented Goldberg with a plaque.

Disenhouse said the Free Loan Cassa provides the Jewish community with temporary financial assistance by offering personal educational and business interest-free loans.

"In times of economic difficulties, we provide financial assistance for starting small businesses, or to assist an individual who requires retraining or upgrading.

"However, our main objective is to help those who need funds for subsistence. Without this integral part of our agency, our objectives could not be met."

Disenhouse reported that during the first half of 1994, the Free Loan Cassa loaned out more than $600,000 to more than 200 clients.

The agency has over 700 active client files paying outstanding receivables totalling some $1,236,004.

Ella Fleischmann, wife of the late Josef Fleischmann, presented the organization with a donation in memory of her husband, who was an active member of the Free Loan Cassa. The Griff, Harendorf, Lebane Scholarship Award was presented to Aliza Lemud.

Albert Lichter, who received a small loan from G'milath Chasodim 50 years ago, said he saw a notice in The Canadian Jewish News announcing the meeting and decided to attend. In an impromptu speech, he thanked the Free Loan for helping him in the past and he offered to help the organization in the future.

Nathan Disenhouse (left), president of the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa is seen presenting an award to David Goldberg for his dedicated volunteer work as his daughter, Karen Goldenberg, looks on.

Quick Response Program may reduce hospital admissions

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new program to look after the sick at home, instead of admitting them to hospital, began earlier this month at North York General Hospital.

The Quick Response Program, which began at the North York hospital Feb. 6 and will expand in the next few weeks to Mount Sinai Hospital and Doctors Hospital in downtown Toronto, is expected to reduce hospital admissions through quickly arranged home care.

Patients at 14 Metro emergency rooms can have home nursing and medical equipment arranged within an hour, or three at the most, say planners.

The Ontario Ministry of Health is funding the program for a year with a $675,000 grant.

If the results of a 31-day trial at North York General in 1993 are any indication, 20 per cent of emergency patients will be referred for quick home care, freeing up an equal percentage of hospital beds per month.

Another 40 per cent will receive regular home care services.

"This is a significant development for us," said Debra Bloomfield of North York General. "People who can be looked after at home eat better and sleep better and are less anxious. It is also of great benefit in those cases when the other person at home is not able to look after him or herself, let alone look after a sick person."

The program covers nursing, homemaking, medical equipment, physio- and occupational therapy, social and lab work, medical supplies and nutritional counselling.

Although the program is offered to patients of all ages, it is of most benefit to senior citizens. In the North York trial, for example, 79 per cent of the referrals were patients over 65, including 32 per cent between 80 and 99 and seven per cent older than 100.

"We've found there are many seniors who look to hospitals for a lot of care that could be provided at home," said Dr. Isser Dubinsky, medical director of the emergency program at North York General.

"Often elderly people end up hospitalized after a minor injury or illness because they don't have someone at home to help them get their medications, do their house cleaning, or get groceries."

The Quick Response Program started in three Scarborough hospitals in January and within six months will be at all 14 participating hospitals.

To make it work, hospital home care staff hours have been extended from 4:30 p.m. to 8 p.m., including weekends. Patients admitted to emergency after 8 p.m. will have to stay overnight in hospital.

Single parents bridge gap

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two young widows, each a mother of three, have come up with an idea which they hope will fill a gap for themselves and other single parents.

Marla Kleinberg, 39, and Eva Izso, 40, are gearing up for the first lecture in a monthly series to be held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation. The program will kick off March 30 at 8 p.m. with a talk on Money Matters: Budgeting and Investments by accountant Hartley Cohen.

After the death of her husband Michael three and a half years ago, Kleinberg came to realize that she desperately needed to spend some time with adults who share her situation.

She and Izso met after Izso was widowed in 1993, and have become good friends.

When the two women attended a large Jewish singles dance last summer, they realized that the number of Jewish singles — and Jewish single parents — was far greater than they had imagined.

Neither one felt completely comfortable with the idea of meeting people at a dance, however. As Izso describes it, a mutual friend called before the dance to tell them, "I bought you tickets, and you're going."

They decided to approach Debbie Dash, director of programming and outreach at Beth David, where Kleinberg is a member, to act as a resource person and help set up a program that would be useful and unintimidating.

Dash, a social worker by profession, notes that the program is not a therapeutic one. It is open to the community, and there is no charge for the first program.

Future programs include Marcia Herberman and Harriet Brown of Travel 24 on Single Travel and therapist Susan Leventhal on The Pressure and Pulls of Single Parenting: Creative Approaches.

Anne Golden appointment

TORONTO — United Way of Greater Toronto president Anne Golden is being given a leave of absence to chair a new task force on the Greater Toronto Area, said Premier Bob Rae.

Rae thanked United Way for its "gracious loan of Anne Golden" for a period up to 18 months.

The mandate of the task force is to put together a workable vision for the governance of the Greater Toronto Area.

Golden has a long history of provincial and municipal government experience.

She worked with the provincial Liberals as special advisor to the Leader of the Opposition, Stuart Smith and then became director of Policy Research for the Ontario Liberal Party.

She joined United Way in 1982 to hold the positions of director of allocations and government relations and campaign director, before becoming president eight years ago.

New book examines medieval Cairo synagogue

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Prominent Montreal architect Phyllis Lambert has been building a dream of the late Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat to facilitate Jewish-Arab dialogue in the Mideast.

For the last 15 years, Lambert has been restoring the 11th-century Ben Ezra Synagogue in Cairo as the future home of an interfaith centre proposed by Sadat for Jews and Arabs to find common ground in the region's rich history.

In 1980, Lambert came across the ruins of the Roman Fortress of Babylon in old Cairo, within which was the crumbling Ben Ezra Synagogue. Lambert is director of an international project to restore the synagogue.

"We believe the past can inform the present and guide us to the future," she said.

Lambert, founder and director of the Canadian Centre for Architecture, is best known for her activism in preserving Montreal's architectural heritage. But last week saw the launch of Fortifications and the Synagogue: The Fortress of Babylon and the Ben Ezra Synagogue, Cairo, edited by Lambert and published in London.

The book is unprecedented in its comprehensive examination of Christianity, Islam and Judaism in medieval Egypt, and is probably the most serious study of a Jewish institution in the Islamic world.

It presents the first measured survey and photographic study of the fortress and the synagogue, as well as a thorough study of the archives found there, known as the Geniza manuscripts.

The Ben Ezra Synagogue once contained an extensive collection of ancient prayer books, manuscripts, correspondence, business records and other priceless documents dating back to the 10th century CE. Much of the well-preserved material is now housed at Cambridge University in England.

The only other publication to show a ground plan of the Roman fortress appeared in 1884.

The large-format book contains a series of color photos by Richard Pare of the synagogue and its surroundings, as well as many plans, engravings and other illustrations.

The foreward is written by Willian Brinner, an expert in the religion and culture of the Arab people, as well as Jewish history in the Arab world.

Wagman Centre awards

TORONTO — Ten years ago Martha Chapman joined the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care to get some exercise. Today, at age 70, her exercise routine would exhaust people half her age.

From early May until late October, Chapman rides her bike to and from the Wagman Centre and just about everywhere else she needs to go. In the winter, she walks indoors in addition to a year-round weight lifting and aerobics routine.

The Wagman Centre offers land and water exercise programs for those 55 and older. Each year close to 50 Wagman members are honored for their fitness accomplishments.

Positive attitude

Archie Wislesky, who suffered a stroke several years ago, won the Herb Charles Award for his positive attitude and determination in improving his motor skills in the water.

The Wagman Centre programs are just some of the more than 150 health promotion initiatives at Baycrest Centre.

"Baycrest has long recognized that health is more than physical well-being," said Linda Kremer, fitness and health promotion supervisor at the Wagman Centre. "We know that a person's health is affected by many factors including work environment, home situation and connections to the community, or lack of them."

Baycrest has formed partnerships with organizations such as the Metropoliotan Toronto District Health Council's Long-Term Care Health Promotion/Wellness Group and the North York Public Health's Promotion Research Unit.

Singer's performances promote ties to Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto singer Ritasue Charlestein sings Hebrew songs and accompanies herself on the guitar.

She was recently invited by Israel's prime minister, president and chief of staff to perform at a tribute concert at the Mann Auditorium in Tel Aviv, in memory of Simcha Holtzberg, who was known as the father of wounded soldiers.

On her many trips to Israel, Charlestein travelled extensively with Holtzberg, entertaining Israeli soldiers on bases, in hospitals and in rehabilitation centres. "Simcha was my teacher, my friend and inspirational light in my life," she told The CJN.

Charlestein, who is engaged to Toronto lawyer Stan Fisher, moved to Toronto last year with her son Ari, a student at the Associated Hebrew Day School.

She said Holtzberg, who died last year at the age of 70, "gave love, compassion, wisdom, understanding, humor and counsel to thousands of wounded soldiers."

She believes the concert will raise the consciousness of the public, encouraging visits to wounded Israeli soldiers, and provide money through the Simcha Fund for gifts and programs for the soldiers.

Born in New York City and a graduate of New York University with a masters degree in French, Charlestein sang with the Zamir Chorale in New York and Jerusalem and was a soloist in Philadelphia where she lived after her marriage.

The mother of four children, she has travelled extensively and sang for the refuseniks in the former Soviet Union in 1981. She performed for State of Israel Bonds in the United States and France and has been featured at United Jewish Appeal campaigns throughout the United States. She has appeared at numerous events for the State of Israel and taught music at Jewish summer camps, including one in Greece.

Charlestein said her goal is to "get people to feel the way I do about Israel, by weaving stories with music that speaks of responsibility of Jews one to the other. I guess you could say I have an obsession for Jewish peoplehood."

In Toronto, Charlestein plans to establish music classes for preschool children. "I believe it is important for children to become acquainted with Israeli and other Hebrew music at a very young age — this has a profound and lasting effect on the children."

Ritasue Charlestein

In paying tribute to Holtzberg, Charlestein said, "From Simcha, I learned to look when what I saw before me was too grotesque to look at. And from the soldiers, I learned that my voice had healing powers. Simcha and the soldiers have taught me a great deal about life and I am delighted that I will be able to participate in the yahrzeit concert for one of Israel's great heros."

Carnival teaches tzedakah

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A one-day French carnival at United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) is teaching students they can learn, have fun and do a mitzvah — all at the same time.

For the USDS Carnaval d'Hiver (Winter Carnival), youngsters at the Beth Tzedec and Beth Tikvah branches have been collecting gently used toys to donate to Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS).

"I think it's wonderful [students] realize there are members of the community less fortunate than they are, and that they ... help those in need," said JF&CS executive assistant Florence Weinberger.

"Tzedakah is such an integral part of Jewish life that it should be transferred into our school life and celebrations," said French teacher and organizer Jonie Samery.

In addition to involving the children in tzedakah, the carnival will give them a taste of Quebec culture, said Samery. The event has been modelled on the annual 10-day Quebec winter carnival in February. Organizers hope the USDS carnival will become an annual event.

"Kids learn better if they experience the language," said Myra Webb, a French teacher at Beth Tzedec and a carnival coordinator.

Students have been learning related French vocabulary and some have been preparing presentations such as French rap songs about winter sports.

Singers Bill Russell and Ann Lederman of Mariposa in the Schools performed at the Bayview campus this week and will stage a show at the Bathurst campus next week.

"We're excited that our teachers have taken [this] initiative," said education director Solly Kaplinski.

New Life Landscaping branches out into playgrounds

New Life Landscaping has been in operation since 1984. It is a family business run by three partners, brothers David, Neal and Jordan Sadja; Jordan has a Master's Degree in Landscape Architecture. They offer a full landscaping service, which includes landscape design & construction, year-round maintenance services, tree & shrub services, irrigation services, and annual flower and bulb design.

New Life Landscaping has done work for some of Toronto's most prestigious developers: Menkes Industrial Parks, Belmont Construction, Marathon Realty Group, Wycliffe Property Management and Revenue Properties, to name a few.

New Life Landscaping branched out into the playground business in the spring of 1994 with their acquisition of LMS Wood Creations. LMS operations manager Randy Wells, brought his extensive playground design and construction skills with him to the new company, Rainbow Play Systems. Rainbow hopes to have a playground showroom set up by mid-march in North York.

Rainbow Play Systems will sell and build residential and commercial play structures from natural cedar or California Redwood. This wood is long-lived, resists rot and water, and is safer than some other woods, especially for children, because it does not splinter. "We will concentrate exclusively on wood and plastic products," says Randy; "there's more future in them because they wear and look better."

David calls the new venture "one-stop shopping for the backyard." Besides entire playground sets, customers will be able to order individual accessories, swings or structures; backyard furniture and accessories such as picnic tables will be available as well. They will do custom playgrounds, move a playground from one home to another, and do playground landscaping.

The primary product line will be Rainbow Play Systems from the U.S. Rainbow will also carry a higher-end California redwood product, and a more affordable East Coast cedar line.

The average cost of a playground, says David Sadja, is between $1,500 and $2,500. As such, it is a family investment. It can add to the value of a home to be sold when the kids are grown up, or be worth moving if they are still of an age to enjoy it. Also, jokes David, a father of three, "it's the best way to know where your kids are."

If you call from this article or ad before March 15, your playground will be installed free. This offer applies to whole playgrounds only. Please allow six to eight weeks for delivery. For more information, or to order your catalogue or playground, call Randy Wells at (416) 736-7728.

HERB CAPLAN

TORONTO'S #1 APPLIANCE SUPERSTORE

State of the Art Appliances

Walk into Herb Caplan Appliances' showroom at 1111 Weston Rd. and you are stepping into a "world" of major home appliances.

After looking at refrigerators that can be integrated into kitchen cabinetry and commercial style stoves complete with indoor barbeques and convection ovens, customers cannot help but be amazed at all that is new and exciting in today's appliances.

Owner/operator Martin Caplan has been at the same location since 1953. He too is constantly in awe of the continuing radical changes the appliance industry is experiencing.

For example, the exciting new refrigerators from Sub-Zero are a dramatic change — a revolution from the way we perceive and use standard refrigerators. They are built-in and hidden behind doors and drawers so they can fit anywhere in your kitchen. They make food storage convenient and quick. Vegetables can be stored in refrigerated drawers by the sink, milk and juice in a cabinet near the kitchen table and ice cream or frozen dinners in a separate freezer drawer easily accessible to the kids. Units can be mixed and matched according to needs.

"A great advantage of these separate storage units is that each features a micro-processor control panel to program specific temperatures. Meat can be stored at one temperature while vegetables can be stored separately at a different temperature so foods stay at their peak freshness."

Refrigerators are not alone in the exciting evolution of appliances. Stoves, which were once merely a means of preparing one's daily food are now designed to complement a cook's kitchen and provide commercial-type cooking performance in a cook-top designed exclusively for residential use. Features can include Ceran glass surface with halogen burners, stove-top barbeques and griddles, rotisseries or woks and convection ovens. Ceran cooktops, available from many appliance manufacturers are made from transluscent, pore-free, glass-ceramic material that make them extremely durable, able to withstand high heat and sudden and severe swings in temperature, yet transmit heat efficiently. The flat surface of a Ceran cooktop makes cleaning a snap.

The high cooking speed in a convection oven eliminates hot and cold spots so food is uniformly cooked even when doing entire meals or multiple rack baking. "The new gas stoves have burners running from a low simmer to a high heat that boils almost instantly. There are so many stoves from which to choose. There have never been choices like this before," says Caplan.

After the food has been cooked and the meal enjoyed, it is time to do the dishes, and this new evolution in appliances has not stopped short of the dishwasher. As with the refrigerators, the integrated dishwasher is fitted with the same cabinet front as the rest of the kitchen. Among other features, these dishwashers are almost silent, have a stainless steel interior, adjustable basket height and lower basket inserts. With energy consumption an important issue, consumers will be happy to note that the latest models in dishwashers use less water and less detergent than ever before. "Even noise is an environmental factor so an almost silent dishwasher is an environmentally friendly dishwasher," says Caplan.

He says however, that despite all these choices, shopping at Caplan's is an easy, enjoyable and comfortable experience. After offering customers a cup of coffee and a donut, the experienced and friendly staff is always available for consultation and advice. Whether looking for the basic stand-up refrigerator or the new state-of-the-art line, "we are there to help. We know people can get confused with the choices available to them and we do all we can to teach them everything they need to know. My staff, some of whom have been here for 30 years, are here to guide customers from the moment they walk into the showroom until the appliance is installed in their home."

He says that Caplan Appliances is a name that everyone knows because it is "number one with regards to service and reliability. The store is owner-operated and my wife Fran and I are always on hand to ensure that everything is running smoothly. We give a personal touch that is not available at large retail establishments. We are unique because we are specialists and to make things even better, we are price-setters and industry leaders and are always competitive.

"Our great prices and large inventory have caught the eye of Toronto's leading kitchen designers and renovators who recommend their clients to us for the best selection and best price for their kitchen appliances. We carry most top European and North American brands, including appliances by Admiral, Inglis, General Electric and Jenn-Air. The bottom line is that we have something for everyone and kitchen professionals know that is important. They want their clients to have the largest possible choice to meet their individual needs."

Condominium buyers who would like to upgrade the appliances that come with their new apartment can trade them up at Caplan's and buy replacement appliances "at our famous low prices. We are able to keep the prices low because we are owner-operated and we work out of only one location. By having the entire business under one roof we are able to maintain that personal touch so important to our customers. Drop into the showroom, experience the personalized service and open your eyes to a world of appliances our grandparents never even dreamed about. With one of our latest stoves, you'll cook like a chef and be the envy of all your friends," Caplan says.

DISTINCTIVELY DACOR

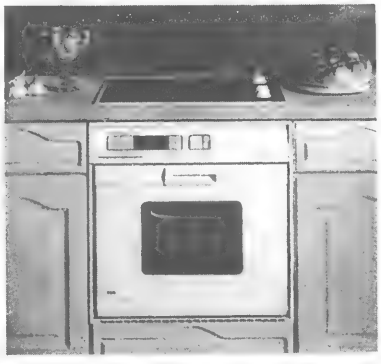
The steel frameless styling of the new Dacor Convection Plus ovens and the gracefully curved profile of the control panel and door handle introduce a new standard of elegance in kitchen design.

This beautiful shape leads a design trend toward more rounded surfaces with natural appeal. The control panel is absolutely smooth with no knobs or buttons thus making it extremely easy to clean.

The design sophistication of the Convection Plus is enhanced by the slim profile of the louvered exhaust grill and the elimination of trim between the lower and upper oven.

Pure Convection with a full-size high wattage heating element outside the cooking chamber working in harmony with the convection fan for superb results in multiple rack baking and preparation of complete meals.

Creda



INNOVATIVE DESIGN • REFINED STYLE ADVANCED PERFORMANCE

Offering a sophistication not always found in the North American cooking appliances, Creda is the embodiment of 'haute cuisine', bringing distinctly European flavor into Canadian kitchens.

Designed to fit flush with cabinets and countertops, Creda ovens, cooktops and dishwashers will blend perfectly with modern and traditional decor.

GARLAND

THE UNCOMPROMISING PERFORMANCE OF GARLAND

It's heritage is decades of use in the world's finest restaurants. How it performs is the only standard by which demanding, professional chefs have judged its value.

The Garland Restaurant Range for the Home incorporates design and performance features professionals insist upon, enhancing them for safe and efficient use in your home.

If you're accustomed to owning the very finest, then there is really only one choice. Because Garland goes well beyond simply being the best in its class. It IS the class.

It began as a range for professionals. And stayed that way.

Regency Interiors carries on a tradition

Regency Interiors 2000 Inc. is owned by Sal DiMeglio, who was with the former Regency Interiors for 18 years. There, he gained his knowledge of the business working for his father-in-law, former owner Max Kingston. Max is still a presence, helping Sal establish the new company.

Manager Lydia Carter is also with the new Regency, as is Pasquale the installer, who was with the old Regency for 22 years. This is a team of people who have worked well together for many years.

For over 23 years, the old Regency had been known for customizing and retailing modern furniture; the tradition continues. "About 50 per cent of our business is retail," says Max, "and 50 per cent customizing." Most of their new customers, he adds, are referrals, with orders coming in from across Canada and the US.

Regency Interiors' 4,500 square foot store shows every kind of furniture from antique to contemporary, in marble and Italian leather, as well as children's furniture, but emphasizes the contemporary. There are several lines of modern lacquered furniture from the US, Italy and China. Also, the new Regency still makes furniture with remote-control units, which customers can watch in operation.

Two well known Regency specialties are lacquered linen and stone furniture, which they sell and custom-make. Both types of furniture are laminated and wood based. They are available in single items such as coffee tables or wardrobes, as well as in sets for bedroom or dining room.

These unique finishes are available in matte, glossy or semi-gloss and can be custom-colored to match any scheme or decor. An ideal way to rejuvenate a well-loved older piece of furniture, is to finish it in a lacquered linen or stone application.

Complete interior decoration

Regency offers a complete interior decoration service from a single room to a condo or house. They also offer a minor, non-structural renovation service. Customers are welcome to bring in their own designs, or let Regency design something that suits them. Prices are medium to high-end.

Regency does a lot of work with major interior decorators and designers. "They come to us," says Max, "because we can custom-make what they need for their clients." Besides home decorating services, Regency designs offices, and has done a lot of work for lawyers, accountants and other professionals at their place of business.

Regency is inside Union Electric, at 1491 Castlefield Ave. The closest intersection is Caledonia and Lawrence, not far west of Dufferin. For more information, call (416) 654-9100 or fax (416) 654-4631.

HENRY ENDER – took the plunge into WATERFRONT PROPERTIES; another side of him that you may not know about.

You know Henry Ender as the President and Chief Executive Officer of Seafood Warehouse International Co. Henry's interest in the Cottage and Recreational Property market started in 1987 upon his viewing how the changing demographics within Southern Ontario could impact on this segment of the real estate market. He began to witness how the "desire" which today we would call a "need" to own an affordable waterfront or recreational property began to take firm root. Being involved with cottage and recreational properties allows Henry Ender to relax and get out of the warehouse and office periodically from the growing seafood business. He made his first dive into this burgeoning market with "the first purchase". This was done using one of the major principles that Henry governs himself by today – finding properties that he truly liked, one that he would be happy spending time at on the weekends, holidays and/or in retirement. The first property was purchased on Deer Lake, which Henry Ender says involved all the planning, approvals and bureaucratic hassles and odd nightmare that he had not expected (which form a story in themselves). Today it can be boasted that Deer Lake has become a gorgeous property that now is for sale with five remaining large southern exposure waterfront lots.

Henry Ender's interest in cottage and recreational properties quickly became more than just relaxation, it grew quite rapidly to other properties on Ruth Lake, Maeck Lake, Eagle Lake, Lake Cecebe, Jack's Lake, Lake Debois, Lillie Kup Kamp, Fox Lake. With this rapid growth also came the realization that the time commitment necessary to ultimately "bring these properties to market" was more than he alone was prepared to spend. With a group of associates Vacation Properties Development Corporation was formed, of which Henry is the Chief Financial Officer. Vacation Properties Development Corporation develops cottage and recreational properties to serve the burgeoning market that demands properties along the corridor between the Muskoka lakes north past Huntsville along Highway 11 to South River and area. To Henry's knowledge and pride, Vacation Properties Development Corporation has become the largest cottage and recreational waterfront and building lot developer in this region, which allows them to offer properties at affordable prices and if needed provide their own financing to purchasers at below market rates. To market their properties once they are ready for sale Henry Ender has turned to Cormac McCarthy, sales representative of Bowes and Cocks Limited, Realtor (416) 483-5227. Cormac McCarthy specializes in waterfront properties and he is a member of both the Muskoka Real Estate Board and the Toronto Real Estate Board.

Henry asserts that Fox Lake is perhaps one of the best ways to illustrate the quality that they provide. It is their latest waterfront lot development and took 4 plus years of planning and approvals. Located 18 kms west of the town of Huntsville (Deerhurst, Hidden Valley, Golf Courses), the nineteen waterfront lots are located on the opposite end of the lake from the famous Camp Winnebago (which many readers will be familiar with). These 19 waterfront lots offer desirable southern exposures, well treed sites, many sand beach areas, varying elevations, excellent building sites and privacy, with all on large lots (the smallest lots are 200 feet of waterfront on 1 acre for $65,000) and includes a large open reserve area for the use of the lot owners. THe Fox Lake waterfront lots will be one of the few quality waterfront lot developments in this area this decade. When Henry Ender purchased the site, it was a property that Henry truly liked, one that he would be happy spending time at on the weekends, holidays and/or in retirement, which just may be the case as Henry Ender is planning to build his family a cottage on one of the lots at Fox Lake.

Art Interiors

"The Anti-Gallery" – One Year Young! It's not that we're against Galleries - it's just that we're uncomfortable with the formality of them!

We're young "Artrepreneurs" (24 year-old women, actually), who believe that the un-original poster art of the 1980's is OVER.

Here's our answer: A forum for young emerging Canadian artists. There's lots of untapped talent out there! We've hand picked the very best of that up-and-coming talent, and gathered it all together to create a varied collection (traditional to contemporary) for anyone who wants original art at an affordable price.

Sound interesting? Well, it is! We're having fun and we've had a successful first year to boot! We've made our showroom an inviting place - an informal setting - our walls filled from floor to ceiling with all of our artists' originals and custom frames. Flip through bins of works on paper or browse through stacks of oils on canvas. You can stumble across a real find! We'll help you - or we'll leave you alone.

We'll suggest custom framing (which we also provide). We'll give you information about our artists (90 and growing)

You'll love our constantly evolving group show as much as our very affordable prices (no painting exceeds $2,000; original etchings can be found for $25.).

We look forward to seeing you at 446 Spadina Rd., Suite 208, north of St. Clair in the Village; phone (416)488-3157.

Carrocel Restorations

Manny and Joseph Cabral opened Carrocel Restorations in the early '80's. Carrocel specializes in restoring and building antique and formal furniture, in styles which have stood the test of time: Hepplewhite, Chippendale, Duncan Phyfe, Louis XV and Queen Anne.

"Building and restoring heirlooms is an investment," says Joseph. Because it is also an exacting craft, the partners make a point of being present at every stage of the work. Because everything they make or restore is hand-crafted, they work closely with designers, interior decorators, cabinetmakers and carvers.

Carrocel offers full furniture restoration services, custom building, finishing and upholstering. They will build in a period style, or to match something you already have, for example, adding chairs to fill out a set. They also sell antiques, do some importing, mainly from the U.S., and will search articles out for their customers.

"No two customers want the same thing," Joseph asserts, speaking from experience. People ask for everything from reupholstery for a single chair, to custom-built tables to seat 12 or more at an extended family gathering, to an entire set of eight or ten chairs.

Carrocel Restorations is at 3115 – 14th Ave., Unit #4, in Markham near Woodbine and Steeles. For information call (905) 475-6942.

HomeLife/Partners: "90-day guarantee or free"

HomeLife/Partners Realty Inc. is a company with a strong commitment to satisfying the client. In an economic climate where everyone wants to be sure of getting the best possible value for every dollar spent, there is a lot of talk about service. Partners is a company which, in President Al Kroch's words, puts its money where its mouth is. Here, service is a matter of action, not just talk.

In 1994, Al points out, of more than 20,000 homes on the market in an average month, only about 4,000 actually sell. This works out, on average, to just under 20% of the houses on the market. Partners is in business to up this average.

Partners is the first realtor in Toronto to offer the vendor a written guarantee to sell a house in 90 days. If they are not successful in that time, the vendor has the option of continuing the listing with them; they will then continue to market it until it is sold, waiving all entitlement to their share of the commission.

This incentive motivates Partners to give every customer their best service. Al and company Vice-President Beverley Wise both have experience in training sales people; they give their sales force an enormous amount of support performance in return.

Al is up front about answering the major objection the 90-day guarantee will provoke. "During the 90-day period," a prospective client will say, "it really is in your interest to give me the best service you can. In fact, you've set it up so you have extra incentive to move my property – an incentive which another realtor will not have. Once the 90 days run out, though, if you haven't sold the house and have to work for nothing, what will motivate you to keep on giving it your best shot?"

Al's answer is simple. "I still want to be your realtor for life," he tells the prospective client; "and I want you to be satisfied, so that you give me referrals. I'm prepared to take a risk for the sake of becoming your realtor for life, just as you want to have a trusted doctor and lawyer for life – even if the payback for me is less tangible in the short term."

Long-term relationships and referrals benefit both the company and the individual agent. As Vice-President Beverley Wise points out, "this is an opportunity for our sales associates to demonstrate their sales and marketing skills with absolutely no risk to the vendor."

For many people, buying or selling a home is the biggest financial transaction they will enter into; for most people, moreover, their home is their biggest financial asset. While people may not usually speak of their realtor as offering the services of a professional, this is what they want, deep down.

"In order to find a buyer," Al insists, "you need more than a sign and an ad and an MLS listing." Today, with so many properties on sale, an agent must work very hard at marketing. While MLS is good, the realtor must do much more to find the best possible buyer, and to leave the seller with the awareness that the company has done its best.

Personal attention

The sales person needs to treat everyone not just as a customer, but as a client. In the real estate business, to put it bluntly, there is no equivalent to fast-food service. Vendor and buyer alike want personal attention and communication; everyone wants to be treated as an individual. No two houses and no two vendors are the same.

Service to the client begins before the house is even listed. Partners will do whatever they have to, to get the opportunity to market your home. Service also continues after the house is sold. People appreciate post-sale attention, in the form of information on decorators, painters, financing, mortgage renewal, etc. We have a lot to offer beyond the buying and sellin of homes.

Partners offers prospective clients a brochure titled "Choose Wisely", with tips on how to choose a realtor. This includes a list of questions to ask, so that the prospective client can, in effect, interview the realtor. There are two other brochures, "Home Sellers' Guide" and "Maximizing Your House Sale Results", which are valuable to prospective clients.

HomeLife/Partners sees its mandate as educating the public, both homeowners and prospective homeowners, in how to choose a realtor. Al Kroch is confident that the public, once in the know, will come to HomeLife/Partners. For a copy of "Choose Wisely" or the other brochures, or more information, please call Al Kroch or Beverley Wise at (416) 229-4454.

HomeLife/Bayview, Steven Green offers full service

STEVEN GREEN has been in real estate for eight years, and with Homelife/Bayview for seven. At first, he was in industrial, commercial and investment property, then changed to concentrate on homes.

STEVEN offers his clients full service, working hard to bring the right buyer and the right vendor together. For vendors, he draws on his own decorating experience, and works with a few reputable tradespeople to offer free consultation on renovations. A house which needs work can be transformed into a showcase; STEVEN knows what's needed to bring this transformation about.

Most of STEVEN'S clients are referrals, or former clients who are happy with the service STEVEN of Homelife/Bayview has given in the past.

Over the years, STEVEN has sponsored or donated to different Jewish organizations, including the ICRF (Israel Cancer Research Fund) gala and the Israel Bonds gala. This year, he and Ken Kakoullis are sponsoring a golf tournament on June 22, for the Canadian Shaarei Zedeck Hospital Foundation's Neonatal Intensive Care Unit. STEVEN is donating $1,000 and volunteering his time. "Maybe I'll be one of the golfers too," he says, "but my golf game leaves something to be desired."

Homelife/Bayview was founded in October, 1986 as a member of the Homelife real estate network, with a sales staff of four specializing in homes. Since then, the company has grown to over 227 agents, and offers services in land, industrial, commercial and investment properties.

Through the years of growth, Homelife/Bayview has continued to be a supportive company with a family feeling, where the individual client or staff member is important. Mortgage broker Kathy Kotris is on call to assist clients 24 hours a day. "Our broker/manager Ken Kakoullis is always there for my clients and me," says Steven.

Homelife/Bayview's Marketing Action Plan is the best way to sell your home in the 90's. It includes comparative market analysis to help determine the value of your home, local and coast-to-coast promotion, open houses, information sheets directed at prospective buyers, and ongoing consultation with you from the day you list until you sell. Follow-up after the sale includes forwarding of relevant documents, the option of the Homelife/Bayview Home Buyer Program, and a discount with Allied Van Lines to help you relocate.

In the promotion package for 1995, anyone who buys or sells a home through STEVEN acting as agent will receive a $500 gift certificate with Macdonell Photography.

For more information, please call STEVEN GREEN "service at it's finest, always!", at Homelife/Bayview Realty, (905) 889-2200.

Burg gets nod as Jewish Agency head

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Labor Party's central committee last week approved the nomination of Avraham Burg as its candidate for chair of the Jewish Agency, amid angry calls to revise the selection process.

Burg, a 40-year-old Labor MK, was the sole candidate, after the Jewish Agency's powerful advise and consent committee endorsed him over acting chair Yehiel Leket, who withdrew his candidacy, leaving the central committee with one choice.

That brought calls from irate party members, who accused the agency's board of governors, composed of 10 leading Diaspora Jews, of abusing its right to veto candidates, and essentially forcing its choice on the party.

Leket supporters had threatened to disrupt last Thursday's meeting with a proposal to postpone the vote, but a compromise was reached. When the vote came, a majority of hands went up for Burg.

At the same time, many speakers called for a re-evaluation of the selection process. Leket called the process "anachronistic," while Labor Party Secretary General Nissim Zvilli said the committee would hold a separate discussion on the matter.

Before the vote, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who had backed Leket, criticized the agreement but urged members to honor it.

Burg took a diplomatic stand, saying the attack on the board of governors was unfair and adding that the issue of how candidates are chosen would be a subject for another day.

Burg is due to take up duties as acting chair this week. If approved as chair, he will replace Simcha Dinitz, who stepped down last year.

Dinitz is currently on trial for alleged misuse of agency credit cards.

Burg's official appointment would come from the World Zionist Organization (WZO), which elects the candidate nominated by the Labor Party committee.

The Jewish Agency is the primary recipient of funds raised for Israel by the United Jewish Appeal in North America.

The WZO undertakes Jewish educational efforts in the Diaspora and provides the mechanism for Diaspora Zionist organizations to participate in agency decisions.

According to agency rules, the advise and consent committee, which represents the agency's Diaspora fundraising component, must approve candidates before they can be elected.

The committee made its decision after a meeting with Rabin and after nine members, including board chair Mendel Kaplan and Julia Koschitzky of Toronto, met with Burg.

An angry Ora Namir, Israel's labor and social affairs minister, suggested the party "cancel the central committee session altogether, if all we are reduced to doing is rubber-stamping the choice of the Jewish Agency Board of Governors.

"We were confronted with a fait accompli, and it is unseemly that we should pretend to even have a say in the proceedings. This is a sham, and we should say so."

Some in Labor called on Burg to speak out against Leket's rejection; others demanded that Labor be allowed to field another candidate, rather than let Burg win by default.

Leket, meanwhile, said he planned to return to his former position as head of the agency's Youth Aliyah Department.

Speaking at a Jerusalem press conference, Kaplan denied that Diaspora fundraisers had "meddled" in internal Israeli affairs .

Rafi Cohen, taxi driver, will not be forgotten

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — There was nothing unusual about my relationship with the Jerusalem taxi driver, but I could never remember his name.

He was one of the drivers at the taxi station near my home in Jerusalem. It's not uncommon to be on a first-name basis with taxi drivers in Israel — especially if you're considered a "regular."

The first time this cabbie drove up to my house, he had a spirited Middle Eastern melody playing on his tape deck. I was listening to an avant garde jazz cassette on my walkman. I was on my way to a recording studio to complete a radio piece on a jazz festival and I still had to decide which selection I would use.

"Why don't you put your cassette on my tape deck?" he suggested.

Thinking that he might be expecting Ofra Haza or some other mainstream Israeli music, I felt it only fair to warn him: "It's not the kind of music everyone likes."

"That doesn't matter," he insisted. "It will be easier for you to hear it on my tape deck."

Gratefully, I complied. It was easier. The driver didn't say a word throughout the trip. He just grinned. Finally, as we pulled up at the studio, he asked me, "Do you mean to tell me people choose to listen to that?" He shook his head and laughed heartily. That was the beginning of a special camaraderie with this driver, who introduced himself as Rafi Cohen.

Whenever his cab came to my house, he would look at me with mock trepidation and ask if I had brought any music with me. He had an impeccable memory, recalling every detail of our casual conversation — even the name of the jazz musician he had so disdained. He was a natural listener, and obviously loved his job. "I learn something from every one of my passengers," he once told me.

He would always greet "regulars" like me warmly, as though we were old friends. "So how are you? How did you cope with the cold weather? What are you working on now?"

If Israelis are political, Israeli taxi drivers are notoriously so. Just the other day I asked one if he would mind lowering the volume of the radio which was blasting an interview with an outspoken left-wing intellectual. The driver complied, but not without a series of curses about "that Arab-loving traitor" at a pitch that made me sorry I hadn't resigned myself to the blaring radio.

But I never knew what Rafi's political views were. He didn't have the ever-worried look that so many news junkies in this country have. At two minutes to the hour they start fidgeting with the radio dial, so as not to miss a single newscast. Rafi seemed above it all, with his radio playing only upbeat music to which he hummed along.

For many months I didn't see him. One day, after I had ordered a taxi, he pulled up and, upon seeing me, flashed a beaming smile. "Hey, how are you, Leora?"

It was embarrassing. I couldn't remember his name. It was not the first time this had happened. I knew about half a dozen taxi drivers by name and they all seemed to be either Levy or Cohen, either Yossi, Avi or Rafi.

"Don't tell me you don't remember who I am?" he said.

"Of course I do — Yossi Levy, right?"

"No," he said. "Rafi, Rafi Cohen. It's about time you remember," he chided me jokingly.

I haven't seen him in over a year now. But his name is ringing in my head. The newscasts that he never bothered to listen to broadcast it over and over again last week. He was murdered in his cab by two terrorists. Now I know I can never forget the name Rafi Cohen — or the man. May his memory be blessed.

NEW AMBASSADOR TO JORDAN

Shimon Shamir, 46, a former Israel ambassador to Egypt, was named the first Israeli ambassador to Jordan last week. Shamir will head to Amman in about one month, five months after Israel and Jordan signed their peace treaty. [RNS photo]

ANALYSIS

Turmoil causes concern

By EFRAIM INBAR

In drawing-up a balance sheet on the peace process as it stands today, the bottom line is equivocal.

The final analysis, however, must take into account the broader Mideast picture and it is here that Israel has continuing reasons for concern.

The growth of Islamic radicalism, a proliferation of long-range missiles and non-conventional weapons, and a sharp deterioration in many Arab economies portend continued turmoil in the region and sustained security challenges for Israel.

The Middle East is an Islamic region undergoing a process of modernization, pulsating with revolutionary social forces such as the radical forms of Islam. Growing fundamentalist influence in Egypt, in Jordan and among the Palestinians indicates that diplomatic agreements are not necessarily durable.

As well, the Middle East is a region where the use of force continues to be held in high regard by both rulers and peoples. At different times, Kuwait, Lebanon, Jordan and Saudi Arabia have been targets for dismemberment by one or another sister Arab state.

There are a number of other issues in conflict between Mideast states — for example, water rights (Israel-Syria, Turkey-Syria, Egypt-Sudan) or border demarcation (Iraq-Iran, Saudi-Arabia-UAF, Turkey-Syria). Military conflict is a real possibility. Therefore, it is too early to conclude that "peace," is an irreversible Mideast trend.

The best possible results in Arab-Israeli peace negotiations will not rescue Arab economies. Present Arab political elites seem incapable of implementing the structural reforms required to develop sound economies.

Even Saudi Arabia has run budget and balance of payment deficits every year since 1983. Since the Iraqi invasion, Kuwait has incurred huge deficits and its foreign assets have been severely drawn down. Egypt's economy is ailing despite Arab foreign aid and a post-Gulf War cancellation of approximately half its foreign debt.

Jordan's economy is in deep trouble. Like most poor Arab countries, Jordan suffers because the loss of employment opportunities in the Gulf has drastically reduced the remittances from Jordanian workers abroad. This predicament enables Islamic radicals to make headway, feeding on the apparent ineptness and paralysis of the current regimes.

While economic considerations could cap Arab procurement programs, Arab leaders have usually subordinated economic considerations to military and political concerns. Indeed, Arab countries, including Syria, Egypt and Saudi Arabia continue their conventional build-up. The addition of chemical warheads to many Arab arsenals, and continuing attempts by Iraq and Iran to acquire nuclear weapons, are additional causes for concern in Jerusalem and elsewhere.

Let us be clear: Arab-Israeli peace agreements are important, and peace diplomacy contributes to a reduction in the risk of war faced by Israel and her Arab neighbors. But it is unlikely that the diplomatic process begun in Madrid will soon result in a broad-based, long-lasting Middle East peace of the nature pertaining, for example, to the United States and Canada.

Even with peace treaties, challenges to Israel's security will remain, if not intensify, in the coming years.

Consequently, caution at the peace talks is in order. Israel must act to ensure that its defensive capabilities are not impaired in the context of any territorial withdrawals or security arrangements. Some Israeli and Diaspora leaders are urging that the negotiations be accelerated. But speed can lead inadvertently to incautious decisions. I say that patience is prescribed and circumspection required.

Prof. Efraim Inbar is director of the Begin-Sadat (BESA) Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Israel.

Feb. 14:

• The anniversary of the massacre by Baruch Goldstein in Hebron is marked. Palestinians closed businesses, and youths rioted. One Palestinian was killed and five wounded. Israeli supporters of Goldstein held a candlelight memorial service at his grave.

• Hundreds of police reinforcements contained the annual general strike by Druze Arabs on the Golan Heights, held to protest Israeli annexation of the heights.

• The future of the autonomy plan remains in question as long as the Palestinians cannot curb terror, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee.

Feb. 15:

• A court extended the detention of a 22-year-old supporter of the Jewish extremist group Kach. Dorion Goldin was arrested this month on suspicion of planning to attack Arabs in Jerusalem's Old City. Police said he was carrying knives and materials to make explosives.

• Militant Rabbi Moshe Levinger and his wife Miriam, founders of the Gush Emunim settlement movement, were removed by dozens of police officers from their Hebron home and dragged into a Jerusalem court, where they charged with assaulting police officers in 1994. Five other settlers were also detained.

Feb. 16:

• Haredim announce that they are planning to move in large numbers into Beit Shemesh. The mayor of Beit Shemesh responded that he will not allow the Haredim to control the city.

Feb. 17:

• Jordan's government presented a bill to Parliament that seeks to repeal all anti-Israel legislation including the laws establishing an economic boycott against Israel and prohibiting the sale of property to Israelis.

• The body of Daniel Ruckman, the IDF soldier who had been missing since early in the week, was found in the Judean desert. Police suspect suicide as the cause of death.

Skirmish in Lebanon

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli air force jets and helicopters attacked Hezbollah targets in South Lebanon last Sunday.

In separate incidents, a South Lebanese Army (SLA) soldier, a Hezbollah gunman, and two South Lebanese civilians were killed.

Radio reports from Beirut claimed the air strikes had continued late into the night. The Israel Defence Force confirmed only that in the artillery duels, Hezbollah fired Katyusha rockets and mortars.

The attacks followed two days of intensive artillery exchanges and a failed Hezbollah attempt to capture an SLA outpost in the central sector of the security zone.

An Israeli army source said Hezbollah is increasingly operating like a military organization, with clear distinctions between front-line units, artillery, auxiliary units and anti-aircraft units. He said its command structure, tactics and general fighting doctrine are impressive.

Bagel drive-in comes to LA

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — This mighty metropolis, which gave the world the drive-in movie, drive-in church and drive-in bank, has bestowed another boon on folks who just do not want to step outside their cars: the drive-in bagel place.

Goldstein's Bagel Bakery was opened as a drive-in (or "drive-through," as some purists have it) recently in the suburb Arcadia.

Business is booming, as more than 5,000 bagels are passed through car windows daily. Annual sales are expected to top $3 million.

The enterprise was founded by Michael Goldstein, a former stockbroker, and his wife Bridget Goldstein, who once opened a conventional bagel bakery in Old Pasadena.

"Bagels have replaced the doughnut as the food to bring to the office," Goldstein said.

TOBACCO KILLS

three times more people than alcohol, AIDS, illicit drugs, car accidents, murder and suicide.

ALL COMBINED.

Health Canada Sante Canada

Canada

Tobacco kills over 40,000 Canadians every year.

NOWHERE TO HIDE.

- Because their lungs are still growing, children are extremely vulnerable to environmental tobacco smoke, which contains 50 known cancer-causing chemicals.
- Even in later years these children will tend to have more difficulty with reading and related skills.
- Children whose parents smoke have a greater risk of disease including asthma, pneumonia and bronchitis.
- Babies exposed to second hand smoke or whose mothers smoked during pregnancy are smaller than average, more prone to complications at delivery and are subject to an increased risk of Sudden Infant Death Syndrome.

EQUALITY OF THE SEXES?

- New smokers are evenly split between boys and girls.
- Tobacco death rates among women are catching up with those of men.
- Lung cancer now kills more women than breast cancer. And the number of female lung cancer deaths is rising.

VIRTUALLY ALL NEW SMOKERS ARE ADOLESCENTS.

- There are about 500,000 young smokers in Canada age 15–19.
- They represent over $200 million in sales.
- 85% start before age 16.
- Almost 30% start before age 13.
- Of all the 15-year-olds currently smoking, about one-half will die from tobacco products.

Tobacco is the leading cause of preventable death.

But not always.

Montreal lawyer Jacques Bellemare triggered applause from a mostly pro-sovereigntist audience when he claimed being "a little shocked" at what he took to be the League's suggestion that a separate Quebec might mistreat minority groups.

"By what perversion, by what genetic malady" would this take place? a visibly angry Bellemare demanded to know.

Bordan and Libman, who represented B'nai Brith along with Allen Adel, Stephen Pinkus and Ted Greenfield, fired back that the League said nothing of the kind.

Bordan said the brief simply pointed out that a separate Quebec would have to withstand numerous "pressures," among them the possible vulnerability of minority groups to emboldened extremist fringe elements of the nationalist movement.

At one point, two audience members shouted, "what about Israel?" when Bordan questioned the ability of an independent Quebec to fend for itself.

They were ignored. Libman later told The CJN, "if you know history, there is no comparison."

The League's brief argued that separation would not help Quebecers advance their values, improve their quality of life, or preserve their culture.

The B'nai Brith delegation sidestepped a question from commissioner Louise Harel on whether it recognized Quebecers' "right to self-determination." The question, Libman replied, had little to do with the question of separation they were on hand to address.

But Pinkus did pledge, to some applause, that even in a separate Quebec, Jewish Quebecers "would continue to exist [as a community]. There is no question of that."

David Levine, the only Jewish member of the commission, congratulated B'nai Brith for expressing the "concerns of many Quebecers. It is an opinion that should be heard."

He agreed separation would bring difficulties, but argued that is the nature of change.

It was his hope, he said, that "B'nai Brith would continue to have a role in a sovereign Quebec," as it does in 50 other countries.

Palestinians return to work in Israel demonstrates that the idea is moving in a practical direction," Dromi said.

At their meeting last week, Rabin also told Arafat that 15,000 Palestinians, two-thirds of them from Gaza, could return to work in Israel this week. About 900 started work on Sunday.

Before last month's Beit Lid bombing, some 45,000 Palestinians were licensed to work in Israel. In early 1993, an estimated 120,000 Palestinians were working across the Green Line.

Rabin has said he is concerned that high Palestinian unemployment could prove to be a security threat, since Hamas is liable to exploit a climate of economic deprivation.

Security officials say the standard of living in Gaza has dropped 25 per cent in the last six months.

As a long-term solution, Israel and the Palestinian Authority have agreed to establish at least five joint labor-intensive industrial zones to assist Palestinians. However, senior officials admit these areas will not be fully operational for at least another two years.

Palestinian economics minister Ahmed Qreia (Abu Ala) said Sarid's compensation proposal could rectify "an economic catastrophe," if all Palestinian workers are permanently replaced by foreign workers.

"There were 120,000 Palestinians working in Israel during the occupation. Then after we signed a peace agreement, it decreased to 40,000, and now it is down to nothing with the closure, so you can imagine the effect of that," he said.

Jewish education problems exist in Israel, report finds

There is also something of a shocker: a report by former Haifa University rector Aliza Shenhar which showed the dismal state of Jewish education in, of all places, Israel.

Mankowitz is blunt about assimilation. While we can't afford losses, "there will be a fair number of people whose identity is so thin, it won't sustain continuity." Thus, he foresees a world where "there will be fewer Jews, but who will be more Jewish."

Jewish identity is a different matter in Israel, where "it's less a question of remaining Jewish than of commitment and creative continuity.

"It's clear that for us in Israel, we have to celebrate the fact that in many ways, the Zionist dream has been realized. The deeper question today is the one of secular Jews. We have a lot to talk to one another about."

The Diaspora too has much to discuss, including how to move to what Mankowitz calls "active" Judaism; in other words, "finding the best ways to bring Jewish values home and give young people the keys."

That means shoring up relations between lay and professional educators and having better teachers, Mankowitz believes.

"We have to ensure that not only are teachers top quality but that they must have Jewish literacy. And it's important for each school to develop an ongoing process of defining its vision of Jewish education. My dream is of a number of communities becoming active on a broad front of activities and the development of centres of excellence throughout the world.

"My sense," he says, his big arms hugging himself, "is that the best strategy is to create a world so warm and attractive, that people will come in, rather than our need to reach out."

Newt's wife in conflict?

JERUSALEM — Marianne Gingrich, wife of U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich, has raised eyebrows and conflict-of-interest charges because of her high-profile position scouting clients for the Free Export Processing Zone (FEPZ).

On a visit to Ma'aleh Adumim (north east of Jerusalem) last week, she said she does not believe her visit across the Green Line will place her husband in an embarrassing position, or open him up to conflict-of-interest charges.

Gingrich is the vice-president for business development of the Israel Export Development Co., and her job is to recruit investors.

"This is not a conflict of interest," she said. "I'm just doing business, seeing what's going on in the country. I'm doing business with businesses." The IEDC is trying to gain government approval to run the FEPZ, a private, high-tech industrial park where companies can operate free of most taxes and government bureaucracy. The job has left Gingrich open to charges that she is being used to help the IEDC gain favor with the Israeli government.

She said she came to Ma'aleh Adumim because she was invited.

LOEB'S

Advertiser's Corner

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK

TORONTO — As relative newcomers to the competition in retail food shopping in Toronto, Loeb's supermarkets have made some excellent inroads.

The company, which originated in the Ottawa area, offers full service food shopping at competitive, everyday low prices.

There are two Loeb's Supermarkets in the Toronto area which carry kosher products: Coulter's Mill, at Clarke and Dufferin, and Wycliffe Village, at Bayview and highway 7.

Coulter's Mill store manager Mike MacNeil says, "Loeb's is known for service and sanitation. They run clean, sterile stores. We're one of the few that still have packers at the checkouts — we cut our prices, but not our service."

These stores carry a selection of kosher products in prepackaged meat, dry grocery items and some deli and frozen items. MacNeil adds, "Stores are franchised — independently owned and operated. They cater to whatever ethnic group is deemed important to the store." This is how these Loeb's stores are able to meet the demand from their Jewish shoppers.

Franchise operators are normally in their stores six or seven days a week as opposed to 40 hours. MacNeil explains that because franchisees' bank accounts are at stake, more effort is put into their work. The franchisee (or owner/operator) has a better knowledge of the pulse of the store. The store is his livelihood. This is where there is a great distinction between Loeb's stores and other chain supermarkets which are corporate owned. The one running the Loeb's takes a personal interest in the store.

"It's his store, it's a reflection on him and his operating capital." Loeb's is a wholesaler, they sell to the owner/operator.

There is also not as much red tape if the customer has a special request or order for the owner/operator. Things can get on the shelves sooner.

An example of this was seen in the London Loeb's, where kosher meats were brought in but not purchased at a rate the store deemed satisfactory. The manager of the store met with customers for a consultation, they surveyed the situation and decided to work out a system of delivery and special orders with Hamilton Kosher meats.

Head office is in Ottawa, and because the chain is well established in the Ottawa area, sales there are high. In Quebec, Loeb's supermarkets are affiliated with Provigo. ZEL's is the Provigo brand name available in Loeb's supermarkets. It represents a quality product at a significantly lower price than a corresponding brand name product.

MacNeil says, "We work on a lower growth operating percentage." Wages are down because they'relatively new, and those funds saved are put into the price. We have the "strongest pricing in the marketplace."

With weekly specials and club packs, they are definitely priced competitively, but in the end, their service is what really sets Loeb's supermarkets apart.

Business & Finance

Working hard and smart said key to investment business

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Laurence Bloomberg says his father had always encouraged him to start a business, so 16 years ago he and four associates took the plunge and founded an investment firm with less than a million dollars.

First Marathon Inc. is now the largest independent investment firm in Canada. In 1993 the company made a $40 million dollar profit from its operations, as well as receiving an extra $30 million from the sale of its discount brokerage to the Toronto Dominion Bank.

"When you work for someone you can make a very good income, but it isn't possible really to accumulate a lot of capital. I had friends who were out building businesses, and they were accumulating a lot of net worth for themselves. You couldn't do this being an employee of a large firm. That was one of the reasons that I decided to start First Marathon," Bloomberg told York University students recently at a career development session held by the Jewish Student Federation.

Bloomberg, 52, the company's president and CEO, in part attributed his success to the values he acquired growing up in an "average" lower middle class Jewish home.

"In my home the values were on education, in a major way, and secondly it was a very strong work ethic in my household. My dad worked hard, my mother was a very strong woman, and they instilled in me the desire to go out and succeed."

He got his first job in the investment field while he was taking his MBA at McGill University. "At the time, in Montreal, Sun Life had the best investment department in Canada and because they were intrigued with my grades they gave me a summer job," he said. "I worked there for two summers and really learned about the stock market."

After graduation, he became a securities analyst at Nesbitt Thomson, and in 1971 he moved to Toronto to head the firm's institutional trading and research division. Bloomberg was named the head of institutional equity operations at Pitfield Mackay Ross Ltd. (later taken over by Dominion Securities) in the mid-'70s. "Toronto was the place to be," he recalled. "The investment business just mushroomed here and shrank in Montreal."

Bloomberg said students who want a career in the securities industry should enrol in the most challenging programs — business, law, chartered accountancy, math — and get top marks. "You have to be a pretty good talker to get past that because there's so much competition, so many bright young people coming out of the schools today. It's not restricted to Canada, we can hire in the States, we can hire them from Europe. There's no problem hiring smart people."

But being smart is not enough. He stressed that those entering the industry must be prepared to work very hard, under a great deal of pressure, and put in long days. "The investment business is fast moving, it's a treadmill. If you're looking for an exciting area that's very demanding — there's a lot of pressure — and if you can take the heat you can do very well, if you can get in."

Bloomberg predicted that the securities industry here would grow along with the growth of wealth in Canada. Employment opportunities are good, he said, as Canadian firms are now operating all over the world and international firms are opening offices in Canada.

Resorting to a Jamaican vacation

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Take heed of this sign, or you might regret it. [Ron Csillag photo]

MONTEGO BAY — If, as the ditty goes, you're first to be thirsty in Montego Bay, fret not. There's always a cool rum punch with your name on it. And nowhere better to sip it than calf-deep in some gently-lapping waves, preferably on the beach of one of the city's many five-star, all-inclusive resorts.

MoBay, as locals and many tourists call it, is the tourism capital of Jamaica's north coast, with lots to do or, if the traveler is so inclined, many places to be inclined.

This sun-drenched town is also dotted with many fine restaurants (the better resorts tout kosher meals, although under whose supervision isn't clear); solid entertainment (some of it kitschy pop but also some great local reggae); and accommodations ranging from the serviceable (Holiday Inn) to the positively decadent (the world-famous Half Moon Club).

Montego Bay boasts several all-inclusive resorts: Sandals Montego Bay, the Sandals Inn, the Sea Garden Beach Resort, Sandals Royal Caribbean and Jack Tar Village. Water and land sports, meals and amenities are included in prices.

More modest hotels in and around town include Richmond Hill Inn and Toby Inn. Also worth checking out is Coyaba, a new, moderately-priced beach resort that welcomes families with young children. Rooms are plantation style, with beautiful, locally-carved furniture. Guests can choose between room rates, based on double occupancy, or an all-inclusive, per person rate. A nanny service is available.

Those in the know say tourists will be in for a real treat with the opening of Breezes MoBay, scheduled for this July. The $13 million luxury resort — to be nestled on posh Doctor's Cave Beach, considered the best stretch of beach in Montego Bay — is part of the SuperClubs chain that includes the Grand Lido and Hedonism II in Negril, and Boscobel Beach and the Sans Souci Lido in Ocho Rios.

Then, there are the high-end accommodations, where, as the saying goes, if you have to ask how much they are, you likely can't afford them. Round Hill, 15 km west of Montego Bay, is where the jet set frolics.

Round Hill bills itself as the Caribbean's first great resort. Perched on a lush 100 acre site that was once a pineapple plantation, this is the place one hopes to go to upon death. Accommodations range from the Pineapple House and its 36 carefully appointed rooms, half of which face the ocean, to 27 individually-owned villas, each with two, three or four suites. Most villas have their own fresh water swimming pools. And, oh yes, a maid cooks breakfast.

As for life outside the resorts, a good bet is to take in the so-called Great Houses — the preserved or refurbished estates of the one-time British plantation owners.

CJN reporter Ron Csillag recently visited Jamaica as a guest of the Jamaica Tourist Board. Air travel was provided by Air Canada, which flies a 747 to Kingston and Montego Bay daily.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

What's New in Israel: Six weeks of cultural treats are forthcoming in Israel when the Israel Festival gets under way in Jerusalem, May 20 to June 10. Offering Handel, Bizet, Bartok, Eisenstein and Shostakovich, the annual fest delivers the best of symphony, cinema, theatre and opera in and around Israel's capital.

On May 20 at the Sultan's Pool, a live orchestra performs Shostakovich as Eisenstein's famous 1925 film, Battleship Potemkin, is screened. At the same ancient site, the London Royal Opera House Covent Garden production of Bizet's Carmen is staged June 6 to 11. On May 30, violinist Pinhas Zuckerman and the Israel Philharmonic perform concertos by Bartok. These are only a few of many upcoming cultural offerings.

Jerusalem's Bible Lands Museum, meanwhile, is benefiting from diplomatic relations between Israel and the Vatican. A special exhibition until May 29 examines the Jewish presence in ancient Rome, The exhibits depict daily Jewish life in the capital city of the Caesars, and the community's relationship with the Roman kings.

Rome is home to Europe's oldest Jewish community. As well, much of modern Israel was once part of the Roman Empire, and Roman ruins in cities such as Caeseria and Jerusalem are major tourist attractions. The Cardo, once the main Roman road running through Israel's capital, is still intact, and serves as both a shopping area and a showcase for archaelogical finds.

Established by Eli and Batya Borowski, formerly of Toronto, the Bible Lands Museum houses other acclaimed collections illustrating the cultures of the Bible lands, going back to 6000 BCE.

The Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Toronto has released more details about Jerusalem's proposed 3,000th birthday bash. It is scheduled to begin this October with a massive pageant featuring musicians and dancers in historical costumes, and set to continue throughout 1996.

According to plans already announced, a King David Chess Tournament will see actors on foot and horseback competing on a giant outdoor chessboard; Zubin Mehta will conduct the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and an international choir in a Gala Concert of Psalms; there will be an international poetry festival, a year-round exhibit comparing Jerusalem with seven other ancient capitals, and much more.

To accommodate the expected crowds of tourists from all over, the government has begun a new hotel construction campaign. Meanwhile, in Canada, the tourist office has organized an intense cross-country promotional blitz for March to inform travel agents and Christian clergy about what IGTO director Ruth Ben-Tzur calls "this year of historic opportunity to visit Israel.

"Never has there been a better time for the travel industry to market Israel," she says. Air fares have dropped on average by more than one-third since Air Canada and Sunquest announced they would compete with El Al on direct flights between the two countries.

Last year, some 40,000 Canadians were among the 2.2 million visitors Israel received. Ben-Tzur and other travel insiders are cautiously optimistic that the figure will increase substantially, perhaps even double, in 1995.

Toronto Guidebook: Visitors and residents of Toronto may find much of interest in the newly-published Insight Pocket Guide to Toronto ($12.95). Its 96 pages are filled with information, color photos and several neighborhood street maps. Written by Joanna Ebbutt, the book offers numerous good walking itineraries, information on shopping, dining and nightlife, and advice on excursions to Niagara Falls and Niagara-on-the-Lake.

This guide highlights many of Toronto's colorful neighborhoods, such as Chinatown, Kensington Market and the Beaches, and attractions such as the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Ontario Science Centre, Skydome and Ontario Place. It also contains a detailed street map in a pocket at the back. A succinct and colorful pocket guide, Insight to Toronto makes a useful gift for Torontonians to bestow upon visitors from out of town.

Torme still sings up a storm

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

It will be a grand night for singing and swinging when Mel Torme ("The Velvet Fog"), with his All-Star Quintet, presents his new show, Sing, Sing, Sing at the George Weston Recital Hall.

The evening of March 15 will revive the music of clarinet virtuoso Benny Goodman, featuring some all-time jazz favorites, as well as spotlighting Torme's talent as a percussionist. (He was so good that Tommy Dorsey, Gene Krupa and Stan Kenton wanted him as a drummer.)

Now 70, Torme has been a professional singer for 65 years. The effortless, swinging singer is at the top of his craft and living proof that taste and agility are alive and well in the age of noise.

Considered one of the finest interpreters of popular songs, Torme is also believed by many to be the best jazz singer around, particularly when he lunges into one of his scat tributes to Ella Fitzgerald.

Mel Torme

He continues to orchestrate his own arrangements of his selected material and has received two Grammy Awards for best male jazz vocalist and 14 Grammy nominations in various categories.

Jazz/pop vocal master, composer, TV and radio performer, actor, conductor and pianist, he has written scripts for successful television shows, including The Judy Garland Show, and authored five best selling books, including The Other Side Of The Rainbow about his experiences with the Judy Garland Show and his recent autobiography, It Wasn't All Velvet.

An immigration agent on Ellis Island in the early 1900s mistakenly changed his father's Russian-Jewish name Torma to Torme. And Torme once explained how he acquired his first name: "My parents were movie maniacs, so my sister was named after Myrna Loy and I was named after Melvyn Douglas."

Versatile Torme can do slow blues; he can belt a song, filling a concert hall with his resonant tones; or he can sing a romantic melody. His love of lyrics and language are exceeded by his lively imagination. He once said, "I see lyrics when I sing — flowers and Central Park and autumn leaves and blue skies and Garbo's face."

The late Bing Crosby described Torme as follows: "He does things only a superior musician can do: he can change keys, sing up and down, make modulations, all the licks, and he always builds up a dramatic climax on top of that. I'm telling you he's the best singing entertainer I've ever seen."

Torme is singing at the George Weston Recital Hall in the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York. For information call 416-872-2222.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

"There's been a great resurgence of interest in Jewish films, both in academia and among the lay public," says York University film professor John Stuart Katz, whose full-year course on Jewish film is, to his knowledge, the only such academic offering of its kind and length in North America.

"I think a lot of it has to do with many people being interested in their roots and where they came from."

Perhaps you've heard Katz's film reviews on CBC radio or television in years past, or on Toronto radio station Classical 96 FM, where he is resident film and video reviewer. Perhaps you've heard him introduce a feature or two at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, for which he has been a programmer and consultant since its inception. (He is also a consultant for several other Jewish film fests across North America.)

Or perhaps you've had the pleasure, as I have, of taking one of his courses at York. Although more than 20 years have lapsed since I took Katz's documentary film course, how well I remember his incisive style and his uncanny ability to frame a film in an appropriate context to elicit an audience's greatest appreciation. All the textbooks from that course are still on my shelf. He is the author of a few others: including Image Ethics, written with Larry Gross and Jay Ruby (Oxford, 1988).

John Stuart Katz

Throughout the 1980s, John Stuart Katz produced and co-directed several documentary films and co-authored a screenplay, Isaac Littlefeathers, about an Indian boy raised as a Jew on the Prairies. Produced theatrically, Isaac Littlefeathers was made into a feature film starring Lou Jacobi and shown on CBC-TV. Appropriately, Katz also now teaches a screenwriting course at York.

But it was in regard to another course that Katz, whose former students have helped bring such successful productions as Thirty-two Short Films About Glenn Gould and Three Men And A Baby to the screen, recently caught the attention of Eye On Arts. Moguls, Machers, Shvesters and Shysters is the name of the course that he is offering in conjunction with the Toronto-based Jewish Film Foundation.

The course consists of six sessions in which participants examine various themes depicted in Jewish films. Topics include the depiction of sons and daughters, assimilation, the family, Yiddishkeit, the Holocaust, and humor. The films include Hollywood and foreign narratives, documentaries, personal films, and experimental pieces.

The course begins March 21 at 6.30 p.m. at the Bloor Street Y in downtown Toronto. Registration costs $65. To register, call 416-324-8226.

New Comedy: The Attic, the Pearls and Three Fine Girls is an original play created and performed by Leah Cherniak, Martha Ross and Ann-Marie MacDonald. The darkly comic story gives insight into the complex dynamics among sisters and examines ideas about family mythology.

Mirvishes Support Russian Dance: Toronto arts impresario David Mirvish recently sent a letter to Yolanta Van Arden, director of the Kalinka Contemporary Russian Dance Company, confirming a donation of $10,000 in support of Kalinka's new production of Ostrovsky's The Snow Maiden. In addition, Mirvish and Mirvish Productions offered other administrative and theatrical services worth $10,000 more.

Storytelling Fest Features Robbins: This weekend at Harbourfront Centre, the 17th annual Toronto Festival of Storytelling gets under way with more than 60 storytellers from across Canada. Raconteurs include Sandy Byer, Bob Barton, George Hoeppner, Frieda Ling — and Leslie Robbins, co-founder of Jewish Storytelling Arts, a non-profit storytelling organization, and executive director of last fall's successful Jewish Storytelling Festival.

Jewish Song and Dance: The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir under the baton of Esther Ghan, with accompaniment by Lina Zemelman, is set to perform during An Evening of Jewish Song and Dance at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., Toronto, on Feb. 25 at 7:45 p.m. The evening also features the Village Folk Ensemble, a Toronto-based group that performs dances from Eastern Europe, the Balkans and the Middle East. There is no admission charge, but donations would be appreciated.

Artist gives storefront a whimsical, colorful look

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's fun, it's perky and it certainly attracts attention as motorists slow down and pedestrians stop in their tracks.

Artist Ian Leventhal's "billboard" exterior mural covers every inch of Marci Lipman's signature store on the east side of Avenue Road just north of Davenport. Created in consultation with Lipman, it is a sunny invitation to come in and explore a cosy world of funky-chic casual clothing for all ages. Posters, crafts and giftware add to the ambience. "It's a place where you should expect the unexpected," Lipman notes.

Leventhal, who completed the mural in October when "the light was perfect," drew his inspiration from the late 19th Spanish architect Antoni Gaudi. Reaching back to Gaudi's Art Nouveau period, he presents his own interpretation, warm and whimsical, to match the whimsy inside the shop.

Using ordinary latex paint he has figuratively transported an ancient stone wall with Moorish arches under a Mediterranean sky to the busy Toronto thoroughfare. Exotic flowers growing from the ruins, fashion an enchanted garden against the gray pavement, symbolic of the changing, lively spectrum of Lipman's art-to-wear merchandise. Keeping placid guard over the entrance is the Marci Lipman logo, Spot, the big dog with the bright green markings.

Leventhal's colors, glowing reds, oranges, yellows, demanding blues and greens, are striking and the earthy appeal of flowers and vines meld with today's back to nature trend.

Lipman, a university educated self-styled former hippie of the early '70s, has turned a love of art and animals "I really like Hostein cows," into a successful, unconventional business.

Udder delight

After a year spent wandering through European museums and galleries, she returned to start a small operation as art consultant to design companies which she found listed in the yellow pages. "I knew of terrific poster shops in New York where I could buy very reasonably," she observes. Later she commissioned Canadian artists to design the posters and opened her own shop on Avenue Road next door to her present location.

That was over 20 years ago. She continued for several years but the posters were so popular that she had the artwork applied to T shirts. The first one, a token of her fancy for cows, was called "udder delight."

The T shirts sold better than the posters and she developed a whole line of clothing for infants, youth and adults.

Lipman currently has five stores in the Toronto area. She manufactures her own lines in Toronto for her retail stores and also wholesales them to women's wear and specialty shops across Canada. A new venture is her first franchise, opened recently by a client in Corunna, Ont.

Shimmy doesn't have to wait longer for his story to finally be told

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Shimmy is the youngest in a family of eight children. And he always has to wait.

Miriam Elias, in her delightful book for pre-schoolers Shimmy the Youngest (Hachai Press, 1995), describes his frustration at having to wait for his bicycle to be fixed, for his mother to put the laundry in before she listens to a poem he wrote.

Even worse, he is the last at family ritual life — last to get the kiddush wine, last at Havdalah, last to shake the lulav on Sukkot.

In fact, the only time he is first, he claims, is at bedtime — not a distinction he is pleased about.

His compassionate mother helps him write poems about how he feels, and in the process helps him see that everyone has to wait, sometimes. And that "good things are worth waiting for."

Not to mention that he can write poems.

The illustrations, by Aidel Backman, are colorful without being gaudy, and show the gentleness that Elias is trying to say helps a child deal with what seems to him to be overwhelming problems.

The good-size, dark type makes the book easy to read, and the rhyming repetition of Shimmy's siblings' names will add to a young child's enjoyment of being read to.

The book is available in Jewish book stores.

Hearts of Hate:Battle for Young Minds

Documentary reveals neo-Nazi influence growing

By LEORA SCHACHTER
Special to The CJN

For Toronto-based film-maker Peter Raymont, 44, whose documentary Hearts of Hate shines a light on neo-Nazis in Canada, the most chilling thing about these people is not their hate or their violence. It's their growing influence on Canadian youth.

"The scary thing is that it's not just skinheads who come from poor, broken families anymore," he says.

Hearts of Hate: The Battle for Young Minds, airs on CTV Feb. 28 at 10 p.m. It profiles young people actively involved in neo-Nazi groups such as The Heritage Front.

Raymont and associate producer Eric Geringas, 28, spent the last year and a half following some of the more outspoken of the new, younger generation of extreme racists.

One of them, "Elizabeth," a devotee of Wolfgang Droege, is an honors university student whose soft-spoken voice is a jarring contrast to the philosophy of hate and white supremacy she espouses. We watch as she sits quietly in history class; then we listen to her, questioning whether the Holocaust really happened.

Dave, 18, is clean-cut, obviously middle-class. He drives a Chrysler convertible through suburban streets and talks about crime rates increasing as property values go down because of immigration. His fiery public speaking style has made him a favorite at neo-Nazi events, where he says there are always doctors, policemen and lawyers in the audience.

"We [neo-Nazis] are your neighbor, your best friend, your girlfriend or boyfriend, we're in your armies," he says, smiling behind mirrored sunglasses.

Raymont also takes us into the obscure sub-culture of racist rock groups like RaHoWa (short for Racial Holy War), Toronto's popular hate-rock band, and Odin's Law, an extremely violent band based in Vancouver.

Peter Raymont

"I felt like I was inside the heart of darkness," Raymont says of his experiences there. "There was a picture of Hitler on the wall, they had swastikas on their drums and guitars and tattoos all over their bodies. I imagined what it would be like to run into a group like that in a dark alley."

In order to gain the confidence of people like Droege, Raymont says he spent a lot of time getting to know them. He also took them very seriously. He says he never lied about what he was doing or what his own views are.

"I told them I thought it was fascinating that young people were joining their movement in droves, and that the situation deserves national attention."

For Geringas, though, being with Nazis was even more difficult because he had to hide the fact that he's Jewish.

"They suspected it, and they didn't really trust me. But they never told me they knew," he says. "People have said to me it must have been so horrible because I'm Jewish, but if I weren't, would it be any less horrible to hang out with these people?"

Raymont's aim in making the documentary, which is based on the book Web of Hate: Inside Canada's Far Right Network by Warren Kinsella, is to show that the influence of what were once considered fringe groups is growing and reaching younger audiences.

Canadian hate groups are becoming increasingly sophisticated in their tactics — there is even a racist news group on the Internet. They recruit in the schools, they have telephone hotlines and they are tailoring their message to appeal to a younger, angrier generation looking for simple solutions to complex problems.

Raymont's company, Investigative Productions, has recently been granted $55,000 from Multicultural Canada to create and distribute a leaflet to high school students across the country, alerting them to the tactics of neo-Nazi groups.

"If you want to get rid of rodents in your house, you don't turn off the light and go to bed. You turn them on and get out your mousetrap," Raymont says.

A Death In Jerusalem by Kati Marton, Random House Canada $35.00

On the evening of Sept. 17, 1948, on a narrow Jerusalem street, Count Folke Bernadotte, the first United Nations-appointed mediator in the Middle East, was assassinated.

Bernadotee was an experienced diplomat and humanitarian, the nephew of King Gustavus V of Sweden.

In 1945, during the waning days of the war, Bernadotte, as vice-president of the Swedish Red Cross, entered into sensitive and complex negotiations with the Nazis for the exchange of British and German prisoners and the transfer of Scandinavian and other inmates from concentration camps to one supervised by the Swedish YMCA. These negotiations led to the rescue of nearly 21,000 citizens of more than 20 countries. It is estimated that about 6,500 Jews were saved as well.

Obsessed with finding a just settlement to the Mideast impasse, Bernadotte was naive and bumbling. He believed he could satisfy essentially irreconcilable adversaries. His first plan suggested King Abdullah of Jordan should have Arab Palestine, the city of Jerusalem and the whole or part of the Negev, thus shutting out Palestinian Arabs from the UN promised state of their own and forcing Israel to give up chunks of its sovereignty and its land.

At the same time, Bernadotte was largely unaware of a bitter struggle taking place among Jews in the fledgling state over Israel's proposed borders. The two camps were locked in an intense struggle that at times skirted full-blown civil war. Bernadotte was caught in the middle of this polarized debate.

His assassins were members of Lehi (Lohmei Heruth Israel, Hebrew for Fighters for a Free Israel), founded in 1940 by Avraham Stern, who believed in terror as a legitimate means toward the goal of an enlarged Zionist state.

Stern and his followers regarded the British as the greatest enemies of the Jewish people. For them a symbol of the Holocaust was not Auschwitz but the ships bearing Jews which the British turned away from Palestine.

In 1944 members of Lehi killed Lord Moyne, his majesty's minister of state for the Middle East and the highest ranking British official in the region. It was rumored that Lord Moyne had referred to the possibility of the rescue of Jews with the comment, "What would I do with a million Jews?"

Stern proposed an astonishing Jewish-German alliance against Britain if the Nazis would ensure the safe transfer of European Jewry to Israel. Years later, speaking as prime minister of Israel, Yitzhak Shamir attempted to explain his position regarding Stern's overtures to the Nazis, "I did not trust it. I knew very well what the Nazi movement was ... Persecution of the Jews was very deeply rooted ... I did not believe they would suddenly perceive any kind of shared interests with Jews."

In 1942 the British, who had offered a $5,000 reward for his capture, finally cornered Stern and killed him in a working class section of Tel Aviv. Several members of his group were sentenced to prison terms for "terrorist activities" but were soon pardoned by David Ben-Gurion.

Kati Marton, a well-known journalist and author of several well-received biographies, has drawn on untapped sources to vividly relate the remarkable story of an assassination and its many-sided implications for the course of Middle Eastern history.

Kallah retreat unites Jewish youth

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Randie Cartman leads a group discussion with Dennis Khanjin, 15, from Barrie, Arielle Berger, 12, from Kingston, and Jordan Williams, 13, from St. Catherines.

The three-day educational and recreational retreat is geared to Jewish youth living in small communities across Ontario. This year's participants — they range in age from 11 to 15 — have come from Guelph, St. Catherines, Barrie, Stratford, Kingston and as far away as Timmins.

The large pile of sleeping bags and backpacks heaped on the floor of the meeting room — everyone is packed and ready to go — is a not too subtle sign that the intensive three-day event is winding down. About 20 teens and preteens mill around the room, schmoozing in informal groups.

Almost everyone is exchanging addresses and telephone numbers. Organizers of this event say parents can expect larger phone bills after these kallahs because it's an opportunity for these youngsters to make new friends.

The kallah is part of the High School Outreach Education Program, organized by the youth committee of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The program is given in three year cycles and includes instruction through home assignments along with two annual retreats. CJC staff maintain regular contact with participants through phone, mail and visits to their respective communities.

The program covers a different theme every year: the first year is an exploration of the students' Jewish roots; the Holocaust is covered in the second year; and in the final year they learn about Israel. The program culminates in a six-week trip to Israel.

Randi Cartman, the coordinator of the high school outreach program, participated in a similar program 12 years ago when she was growing up in Sudbury. "It gives you a real sense of who you are as a Jewish teenager," she says.

"It gives you this whole peer group of kids who are going through what you're going through, like always having to explain yourself to others about being away from school on Rosh Hashanah or eating matzah. People look at you like you're from outer space," she said.

The participants bond because they have so much in common, she says, adding that she still keeps in touch with the friends she met at the kallahs when she was a teenager.

Susan Jackson, director of Community Services and Youth Activities, is in charge of all programs — education, leadership development and continuity — geared to strengthening Jewish life in the communities outside of Toronto.

She works with communities as large as Hamilton which has 750 Jewish families, and with single Jewish families living in places like Manitouage and Timmins.

She says the smaller communities have always been a priority for Congress. "We [Jews] don't all live in one place. These are all viable communities." She says there's a need for the community outreach program because family members no longer live near one another and thus Jews have to rely more on community supports.

Jackson and her staff visit the outlying communities to provide programing and consultation. A new project undertaken by Community Services is the Family Outreach Education Program, which is funded by the JCC as well as the L.A. Pinchus Fund for Jewish Education in the Diaspora.

The program, coordinated by Cartman, provides weekly home-study booklets to 75 families in 25 different small communities. Each week these families receive an educational package which includes an easy to read Torah portion as well as educational material revolving around a specific theme such as Shabbat, the holidays or life cycles.

The package also contains activities for the whole family such as games and arts and crafts for the children. CJC staff visit the families, sometimes running programs for the communities based on the weekly theme. Once a year there is a family Shabbat retreat with educational programs geared to a variety of age groups.

Jackson provides outreach to Jewish university students across the province. She encourages them to connect with the Jewish communities near campus, often organizing Shabbat programs to bring the two groups together, she says.

Jackson also oversees education program for afternoon and Sunday schools. The education committee provides resources in the area of curriculum development and methodology to over 40 day and afternoon schools outside the greater Toronto area.

Much of this educational outreach is carried out by Gary Levine, the senior educational consultant. He visits the communities to work with teachers, principals and lay leaders and he organizes professional development days for them so they can interact and connect with their counterparts in other small communities.

Back at the Lipa Green Building parents are beginning to arrive. It's pick-up time. Devon Searle, a 15-year-old from Stratford, is thrilled about the kallah experience.

"I really, really enjoyed it," she says. "I've never had any Jewish friends. I look around and I think it's neat — they're all Jewish. It's a new feeling. There's a real feeling of family."

CJN Purim Contest

For our Purim contest we are asking children in elementary schools to let their imaginations run loose through the pageantry and the drama of the story of Purim. In particular we are looking for the brightest, most colorful and evocative pictures drawn with markers, crayons, or colored pencils.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1-6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one picture from two different contestants from each grade. These "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN Purim issue. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a gift certificate worth approximately $25.00 from one of our favorite stores.

How to enter: Children may submit as many pictures as they want. However, the pictures should not be smaller than 5" x 7". You can draw on any paper you wish, but keep in mind we are looking for pictures which will show bright colors well and which we will be able to photograph for publication. You may use only markers, crayons or pencils. And you can give them a title if you want to as well.

You may mail or deliver your pictures to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1 If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.
The contest closes at 5:00 pm on February 28, 1995.

The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 1995. Winning pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 1995.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Dear Friend of Israel,

When we count our friends around the world, we sincerely hope to include you. We need men and women who support the ideas and ideals of our country.

With all the changes going on in the Middle East, Israel needs friends like you more than ever. That's why you're invited to receive 3 issues of The Jerusalem Post... FREE!

Not blindly, or with mechanical responses... but with informed judgments and a sound understanding of the facts. For, although developments in the Middle East are encouraging, the unfortunate fact is...

The news from Israel is too often misinterpreted... and even disturbingly distorted by the time it reaches you.

For example, outside of Israel, there was scarcely a mention that...

- Hizbullah is launching rockets into Northern Israel.
- More Israelis have been killed by terrorists since the signing of the Oslo Accord than at any similar period since the establishment of the state of Israel.
- Assad still refuses to commit to a peace treaty.

That's why The Jerusalem Post is so important. Every week, the special International Edition gives you the up-to-date, unbiased information you need to be a fully-informed (and thereby truer) friend of Israel.

If Israel is much more than just a dot on the map to you... If it holds a special place in your heart and your faith... Please accept this invitation and receive the news from Jerusalem first hand, every week.

Since 1932–16 years before the state of Israel was born–The Jerusalem Post has been the only English-language eyewitness to events in Israel.

And every 7 days, the special International Edition will bring you as close to our country as you can get without a plane ticket. You'll learn...

- Why peace in the Middle East involves more than just Arabs, Jews and territory.
- Why many Muslim fundamentalists hate not only Israel, but the whole of Western civilization.
- Why the clash is not just about arms and borders, but about modern civilization versus medieval dictatorships.

Plus you'll meet the political and cultural leaders, the sports and entertainment celebrities. You'll visit the cafes, museums, hotels and night-spots worth knowing about. You'll share in the open warmth of the Israeli experience. And you'll explore the rich traditions of more than 3,000 years of culture and civilization... and see how they affect the daily lives of Israelis.

Send for your FREE trial subscription today!

Return the Certificate to start your subscription with 3 free issues. (That's a $9 value, at no cost to you!) Continue, and you'll get 26 additional issues (29 in all) for only US$29.95...a savings of more than $20 off the regular subscription rate and more than $57 off the $3.00 per copy newsstand price!

in T.O. MESSAGE FROM THE EDITOR

This issue represents the first of in TO's second year of operation. Our first year was overwhelmingly successful; so successful, in fact, that our goal for the new year is to expand to 6 and possibly 8 pages of exciting, informative and enlightening news for Toronto's under-40 set.

This issue contains articles including an inspiring profile of a modern day Oskar Schindler, a writeup on a non-traditional business which uses very modern business concepts, a peek into the lives of one UJA professional and several UJA volunteers, and as always, a calendar of upcoming events during our transition to the new 1996 campaign year.

We continue to add new features, and improve on old ones, and welcome any comments or suggestions you may have. Please call the HOTLINE at 631-5700. ✸ in T.O. Did you Know?

✸ that over 10,000 teenagers from all over the world participated in Israel Experience trips last summer? All the trips are co-ordinated by the UJA-funded Jewish Agency for Israel.

✸ that almost 1,000 children in Toronto receive subsidies to attend summer camp? UJA dollars support the various agencies involved in providing this service, including the Jewish Camp Council, Bathurst Jewish Centre, Jewish Family & Child Service and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

✸ that over 12,000 immigrant Israelis were provided scholarships to attend university through the Jewish Agency last year? 35% of the students are in Israel without their parents.

✸ that over 1,200 new immigrants to Toronto were provided with services such as English language tutoring, resume writing, family-to-family introductions and holiday celebrations?

✸ that over 10,000 non-Jewish high school students visit the Federation's Holocaust Memorial and Education Centre every year? The Holocaust Remembrance Committee also oversees the annual Holocaust Education Month program and Yom Hashoah commemorations.

WHO'S NEW in T.O.

YOSEPH ENYEW: THE ETHIOPIAN SCHINDLER

Yoseph Enyew, an Ethiopian Jew, stepped out of the parking-lot booth on Overlea Boulevard, where he is an attendant. He shone a brilliant smile of life, only found on those who have seen the most hollow of grimaces on the face of humankind.

"One day in 1982, I told my family I was going to buy a shirt," said Yoseph. "Instead I escaped to Sudan. There was nothing for Jews in Ethiopia. We were the 'evil eyes', the 'Falasha'. At night, our neighbours would say, we would turn into hyenas and murder Christian babies."

As Yoseph told me more about his history, his innocence turned to anger.

"I have never been in hell, but it couldn't be worse than Tewawa, a refugee camp in Sudan," he said. "My people, Jews, were dying from hunger. I buried my cousin; mothers and children. I grew old overnight."

After a year, Yoseph was asked by Mossad operatives in Sudan to emigrate to Israel. Instead, he relinquished his place to another Jew and began a chapter comparable to the stories of Oskar Schindler, Yonatan Netanyahu and Eli Cohen.

Over the next 11 months, the slight 20 year-old rescued 1500 Jews from death. Together with the Mossad, Yoseph established escape routes to Khartoum and set up secret bunkers in the Sudanese capital to hide up to 200 people at a time. Under the stars, Yoseph would smuggle small children, old men and women, and families, to be flown to safety to Israel.

Eventually, he was captured by the Sudanese police and thrown in jail. Yoseph was tortured for six days but did not expose the whereabouts of the bunker.

In 1984, through the efforts of the Mossad and the United Nations, Yoseph was released from jail, scarred by torture, and too well known to be able to liberate any more Jews from Tewawa.

It was finally time to leave, and Yoseph went first to Montreal to be with some of his family, and shortly afterwards came to Toronto. He would like to pursue a career in the music industry, and eventually emigrate to Israel. ✸

WHAT'S HAPPENING IN BUSINESS in ✸ T.O.

Doctor Holds Key To A Good Night's Sleep

Total quality management is usually a concept associated with traditional forms of business. Those of us with any experience dealing with doctors would certainly not apply the concept to most medical practices. However, while Dr. Jeffrey Lipsitz is reluctant (as most doctors are) to label his practice a "business", he does recognize that his patients are, in fact, customers, and most have options to go elsewhere if the service he provides is not of high quality.

Dr. Jeffrey Lipsitz

This mindset sets him apart from many doctors and may be a large factor in the success of his clinic, "The Sleep Disorders Centre of Metropolitan Toronto."

Patients are the core of quality health care. Dr. Lipsitz stresses that his goal is to try to provide his patients with appropriate health care of the very highest quality, in a manner that is convenient and patient-friendly. He focuses his attention on diagnosing and treating many of the 20-30% of the population which has trouble falling asleep, staying asleep or getting non-refreshing sleep.

Dr. Lipsitz refers to a study which found that in North America, sleep disorders account for approximately $75 billion in workplace costs resulting from accidents, medical problems and loss of efficiency. Obviously, this is an area of medicine which has major implications and relevance for society.

The problem is that, historically, no one has taken sleep disorders seriously. Many people are affected, often by disorders that could be treated if diagnosed properly, but few are aware that help is available or that in some cases, the disorder may actually be medically serious.

Sleep apnea, for example, is one of the most common disorders, in which people snore and actually stop breathing for short periods of time. Apnea can lead to daytime tiredness, increased risk of heart attack and stroke and increased risk of motor vehicle accidents, yet few who have apnea are aware of it. Almost 9% of women and 24% of men are at risk for apnea yet many have no idea that the disorder is affecting them. Often a spouse or partner identifies the problem, and even then, many snorers brush off the problem as social, not medical. "It is not my problem, it's my wife's! Snoring doesn't keep ME up," is a common reaction.

Take it from Dr. Lipsitz: Snoring is often a symptom of something else. Diagnosis and regular testing result in a treatment which effectively gets rid of the problem. The Sleep Disorders Clinic is one of the leaders in North America in making testing as painless and user-friendly as possible. It is the only clinic in the country which can do testing from the home using high tech equipment which transmits data via a modem.

Innovation, education, quality and service are all vital to Dr. Lipsitz's medical practice. Not surprisingly, he also brings a similar orientation to his community involvement. He has previously been a member of the executive of UJA's Young Health Professionals, and is still an officer of the Federation and a National Vice-President of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Speaking of young leadership, Dr. Lipsitz and his wife Judy Laxer (a lawyer, formerly from Montreal), have been attempting to teach the total quality management concept to their three future leaders. However, the Jewish community may have to wait awhile, since the oldest, Avi, is only 5 1/2 and Yonatan (3 1/2) and Michael (1) are even younger.

In case you may be wondering, all three sleep through the night. Dr. Lipsitz gives all the credit for that to the family sleep expert, his wife! ✸

UJA DOLLARS IN ACTION

UJA HELPS REENA HELP THE DEVELOPMENTALLY HANDICAPPED

In Toronto, treatment of the Jewish developmentally handicapped can be divided into two eras - before Reena and after Reena.

Before Reena, developmentally handicapped Jews had little opportunity to create a cultural or religious identity. Most were residents of a largely gentile centre called Pine Ridge, located in Orillia, where they lived in locked wards, without individual belongings.

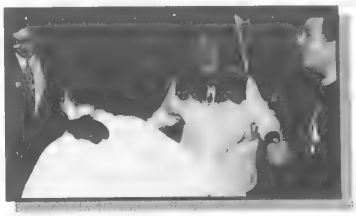
When Pine Ridge closed in 1983, the Reena Foundation decided to provide its former Jewish residents with more than just financial assistance.

Reena's innovative approach, partially supported by UJA, blends Jewish values with individual support in a residential setting. Over 200 clients live in 47 Reena-owned or operated Toronto houses and apartments, assisted by on-site staff, 24 hours a day. Others who can live independently are taught basic skills such as shopping, cooking and cleaning, by Reena specialists.

Myrna Lambert's brother, 56 year old Bruce Kiner, a 20 year Pine Ridge veteran, is now in a Reena residence.

"He no longer has to fight for food. He's more relaxed," notes Lambert, who says her brother's sense of humour and longevity, despite severe physical ailments, has surprised the family.

"My other brothers and sisters would say 'Bruce isn't going to live long,' but he has lived longer than them."



Because 24 year old Michelle Ceresne, who suffers from autism, is looked after in a Reena group home, her mother, Marci, can finally sleep through the night after more than 20 years of round-the-clock caring.

"I slept with one eye and one ear open," Ceresne, a single mother, remembers. "Michelle's mind didn't stop manipulating, scheming and plotting...she would get into the fridge and start dumping things." Today, according to a much relieved mom, "Michelle is much calmer. She listens to me. She sleeps well."

What really distinguishes Reena from similar agencies is its Judaic content, directly financed through UJA contributions.

Reena staff receive manuals on Jewish topics as part of their basic training in holidays, customs and kashrut, and must attend monthly seminars.

"We hope that through the Jewish Family & Child Service chaplaincy division, younger rabbis will soon be training our trainers."

The question of genuine Jewish community interest in Reena's population is one which troubles the organization's executive director Sandy Keshen. She is not sure inclusion of Reena clients is a community priority, and is asking synagogues to provide memberships for Reena group homes.

"How," she asks, "is Judaism reaching out to this population?" ✸

VOLUNTEERING SEEN AS KEY TO PERSONAL SATISFACTION

When it comes to building, Peter Ekstein is a pro - a pro at building UJA's canvasser and donor list that is!

Since his involvement with the Construction Division three years ago, Peter has introduced over a dozen volunteer canvassers and countless donors to United Jewish Appeal.

To Peter, a partner in a lumber wholesale business, that's what it's all about - giving time and money to an organization which supports the Jewish community. "It's nice to know you're participating in a venture that helps so many people in so many ways."

Despite his successful recruiting, Peter wishes that more young people would become involved with UJA. "I get enormous satisfaction knowing that I am doing something good for my community. I only wish more people would participate in telethons or various UJA functions so that they too could have the same feeling of satisfaction that I get."

UJA is just one of the many organizations that Peter, an advocate of Jewish causes, believes in. He also supports the Jewish National Fund and Associated Hebrew Day Schools, to name a few. ✸

VOLUNTEERING A WAY OF LIFE FOR LAWYER

After volunteering and participating in numerous UJA programs for the past year, Toronto lawyer Lynn Kirshin is ready for an even bigger challenge!

Over the course of the past year, Lynn participated in the Federation's Leadership Development course, UJA mission to Prague (Israel and Washington missions were team captain for the closing functions.

And although she may sound like she's done more than get her feet wet, Lynn wants more! She is hoping to participate in Yachday '95, the UJA international young leadership mission to Israel, and would like to do even more for the 1996 campaign.

Lynn Kirshin

To Lynn, being a UJA volunteer is more than an opportunity to raise money for the community, it's a way of life.

"I enjoy volunteering for United Jewish Appeal because it provides an outlet for me to express my Jewishness. I find it extremely gratifying to volunteer for an organization where I'm able to express my identity."

UJA is just one of Lynn's many volunteer commitments. She is also actively involved with the women's group at her synagogue and while a law student, Lynn was involved with the Canadian Jewish Law Students Association. ✸

EVENT REPORTS

Leadership Development: Gotta Have It!

Metropolitan Toronto is one of North America's largest and most vibrant Jewish centres. Previous generations have organized an impressive array of Jewish educational, social welfare and fundraising institutions, central to which is the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

One of the Federation's key functions is the development of community leadership whose role is to help perpetuate Jewish life in Toronto, as well as strengthen Toronto Jewry's relationship with Israel.

To this end, the Federation offers an "annual" training program in communal volunteerism, the Leadership Development program, or simply "LD" as it's fondly referred to. Approximately 40 young adults make a year long commitment to gain knowledge and insight into issues affecting the Jewish community. Various topics are considered, including: the demographics of the Jewish community, volunteerism, Israel-Diaspora relations, Jewish social services, Jewish ethics and the meaning of Tzedakah. At times, the course considers dilemmas and difficult decisions facing current Jewish leaders in an effort to expose potential leaders to the challenges facing today's Jewish community.

As a recent graduate of the course, I found the experience both enriching and inspiring. I highly recommend this program to others who wish to contribute effectively to the Jewish community.

Andrew Cohen, 1994 Leadership Development Graduate

WHO'S WHO in UJA - a look at some of the people behind the scenes at UJA

The Winding Road to Success

Avrum Rosensweig's life history looks more like a radio wave than the purposeful straight line of someone with a predetermined profession.

His career ride includes stops as a yeshiva graduate, commodities specialist, journalism student, broadcaster and UJA Golden Givers Program Director - his current professional posting - the one he likes best.

It took Rosensweig 10 years to get there. A decade of figuring out what he wanted to do and why.

In 1973, Rosensweig left his Kitchener family home for Toronto's Ner Israel Yeshiva, where he spent the next five years, followed by another year of university religious studies.

Then, Rosensweig demonstrated why the unexpected is his most consistent trait. He took a job with a large commodities firm, establishing a successful discount division. But soybeans weren't exactly his future. "I had a great job, but I was miserable," he vividly remembers.

So, it was off to journalism at Ryerson, anthropology at York and co-production of a daily radio show in Hebrew, which left him fulfilled but broke and hungry. Yet, poverty enriched his insights about where to turn next. Jewish activism. "I came from a rabbinic family. This stuff is in my blood."

Rosensweig's late father, about whom Avrum speaks with admiration, was a prominent Kitchener rabbi, highly respected for his efforts on behalf of others.

Rosensweig inherited his father's large heart and it was partly with his dad's memory in mind that he joined UJA on January 15, 1990.

Rosensweig's reflections of his early UJA days reveal large servings of self-deprecating humour. On why he was hired: "Mark Gryfe told me he gave me the job because I made him laugh in the interview." On his premiere projects at UJA: "Thinking back, I had no idea what I was doing."

He seems to have figured it out, and it shows most in his direction of the Golden Givers program for donors with more than 25 years of contributing history. Rosensweig and chairman David Green have identified well over a thousand Golden Givers who receive a quarterly newsletter, certificates, pins and plenty of honour.

"I'm completely amazed by their histories," explains Rosensweig. "There's a real feeling of reality to them. They're not interested in impressing me."

About the future, Rosensweig says, "I'd like to get more involved in humanitarian issues," muses the man who's already thinking about life's next station stop.

Arad reported captive in Iran

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Iran is responsible for the fate of missing airman Ron Arad, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin declared Sunday night, following two more reports that he is being held in Tehran.

"We have a basis for believing that Arad is being held by official Iranian circles, although it is not clear where," Rabin told reporters.

"The Iranians have not given concrete information to either the French or the Germans, so we cannot say anything definitive. But it is clear that Iran is responsible."

However, Hen Arad, Ron's brother, said this week that despite the Israeli government's claims about Iranian responsibility, the opposite is true.

"Mr. Rabin, you are responsible for the fate of Ron," he said. "You sent him, you were defence minister at the time. Today you are the prime minister, and for the whole eight years [he has been missing] you directed the security apparatus. Where is Ron today?"

On Sunday, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung reported that a Turk who is now a German citizen and was held until recently in an Iranian jail, said guards there told him "an Israeli pilot is held in Ward 209, where all maximum security prisoners are held."

UN rights record to be studied

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A University of Ottawa professor is conducting a study on United Nations (UN) efforts to promote universal human rights.

Anne Bayefsky, 41, was recently awarded an $85,000 grant from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation of Chicago for a research project entitled The United Nations' Human Rights Treaties: Facing the Implementation Crisis.

Anne Bayefsky

She will analyze UN activities and make recommendations to assist in "turning treaty texts into social action," a press release says.

"This is no ivory tower project," Bayefsky said. "I will study the subject in a way which will produce concrete and positive recommendations for improvement."

And a crisis it is, Bayefsky told The CJN in a recent interview.

One of her concerns is that the United Nations' preoccupation with Israel wastes time and resources that could be used for human rights issues generally.

Her examples of this bias are glaring:

- Israel is always the first substantive item on the agenda of the UN committee for human rights in Geneva — and has been for 20 years.
- 15 per cent of total meeting time is used for discussion of one of 189 states (Israel).
- 30 per cent of all resolutions critical of individual states passed over the last 30 years concern Israel. Omitted from the list of critical resolutions entirely are repressive regimes like Syria and China.
- The special committee established to investigate Israeli

Austria launches reparations fund

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Austria is establishing a reparations fund for Austrian Jewish victims of Nazism, Austrian chancellor Franz Vranitzky disclosed here last week.

Special to The CJN

In an exclusive interview, Vranitzky estimated that upwards of 30,000 people around the world, including some Canadians, will be eligible to participate in the program.

The size of the fund will be determined by the number of successful applicants.

Anyone who was forced to leave Austria after it was annexed by Nazi Germany in 1938, or who lost property and suffered at the hands of National Socialism, can apply for compensation.

Furthermore, former Austrians abroad may regain their Austrian citizenship and thus qualify for an array of social security benefits normally given to Austrian citizens, one of Vranitzky's aides added.

"People should make use of our offer to reacquire Austrian citizenship," observed Vranitzky.

Vranitzky's aide, who preferred to remain anonymous, explained that the fund will be administered by the Ministry of Social Affairs in Vienna in an "open-ended and unbureaucratic" manner.

It is expected to be up and running by the summer.

"We want to give them the feeling that Austria has not forgotten them," declared Vranitzky, the first Austrian chancellor to visit Canada in four decades. "We've taken an active interest in this matter."

Walther Lichem, Austria's ambassador to Canada, said to the best of his knowledge, only 328 Austrian Jews were admitted into Canada from 1938 to 1945.

Before 1938, Austria was home to about 200,000 Jews. Approximately 65,000 perished during the Holocaust. According to official figures, 7,500 Jews live in Austria today.

ISRAEL

Sect Leader Sentenced

JERUSALEM — The Tel Aviv District Court sentenced Rabbi Uzi Meshulam, the radical Yemenite sect leader who held police at bay for six weeks last spring, to 10 years in prison, two of which were suspended.

Meshulam had been convicted of charges that included endangering lives, conspiracy, aggravated assault and possession and manufacture of illegal weapons.

Eleven of Meshulum's followers were also sentenced to terms ranging from 15 months to four years on the same charges.

Rabbi Auerbach Dies

JERUSALEM — Some 300,000 Orthodox Jews came out on Feb. 20 to mourn Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerbach, one of the world's leading authorities on Jewish law.

Rabbi Auerbach, who for nearly half a century headed the Kol Torah Yeshiva in the Bayit Vegan section of Jerusalem, died at 84 of pneumonia in Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital late Sunday night, Feb. 19.

The funeral procession made its way from Rabbi Auerbach's home in the Shaare Chesed neighborhood to the Har Hamenuchot cemetery, causing traffic jams throughout the capital.

Last Jews Leave Grozny

JERUSALEM — The last four or five dozen Jews in Grozny were expected to take advantage of the ceasefire with the Russians and flee the Chechen capital, according to Haim Chesler, head of Jewish Agency activities in the C.I.S.

Hotel accommodation and relief aid awaited the Grozny Jews in the southern Russian town of Pyotergorsk, near Mineralvody, where some 50 other refugees are waiting for papers to make aliyah.

Chesler said the agency had also arranged to give the potential olim Hebrew lessons during the approximately six weeks it takes to arrange exit papers for them.

Flyover Accord Signed

JERUSALEM — Aircraft belonging to Royal Jordanian Airlines will be able to cross Israeli airspace as of March 10, Transport Minister Yisrael Kessar announced, adding that an air agreement with Jordan would be signed within the next few weeks.

The flyover agreement was reached during talks in Eilat between the heads of both countries' civilian aviation administrations and representatives from both air forces.

A Hot Project

REHOVOT — An $8-million solar energy project to be carried out by Weizmann Institute researchers, together with U.S. and Israeli companies, is one of three binational undertakings recently selected for support by the U.S.-Israel Science and Technology Commission, which evaluated over 100 projects.

The goal of the project is to develop a solar power plant that will produce electricity at competitive prices.

First Arab Appointed

HAIFA — Arab sociologist Dr. Majid Al-Haj, a senior lecturer at the University of Haifa and head of the University's Centre for Arab Education has become the first Arab named to Israel's Council for Higher Education.

The council is responsible for issuing academic status to new institutions and new departments within those institutions, and certifying academic programs and degrees.

Al-Haj said he planned to use his position to help bridge the gap between Arabs and Jews in Israel.

Rabin Fills Cabinet Posts

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has assigned two of his Labor ministers to take over the Interior and Religious Affairs ministries that he had been saving for the Shas Party.

At a special meeting, Rabin presented the Cabinet with his decision to give Tourism Minister Uzi Baram the Interior Ministry portfolio, and Economics Minister Shimon Shetreet the Religious Affairs portfolio. Both men will retain their original portfolios as well.

Shin Bet Head Appointed

JERUSALEM — After months of speculation, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has selected the new head of Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence agency.

The new leader of Shin Bet — who was identified only as "K" — in keeping with a prohibition against publishing the identity of the head of the security service — replaced the outgoing security chief March 1.

According to Israeli news accounts, the new head is in his early 40s, was born in Jerusalem and is the son of a judge. He is also an expert in Jewish extremism.

Non-Orthodox Appointment

TEL AVIV — Bruria Barish, a leading member of the Movement for Progressive Judaism — the Israeli arm of Reform Judaism — was elected to the Tel Aviv Religious Council last week.

This is the first time a representative of the Reform movement has been elected to a municipal religious council in Israel.

Ties With Tanzania

UNITED NATIONS — Israel and the United Republic of Tanzania have renewed diplomatic relations.

Tanzania broke ties with Israel after the Yom Kippur War in 1973.

Documents establishing the ties were signed last Friday at the United Nations by Gad Ya'acobi, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, and his Tanzanian counterpart, Daudi Mwakawago.

RCA Ousts Member

NEW YORK — The Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) has ousted a longtime member because he also belongs to a rabbinic fellowship of Orthodox and Conservative rabbis.

The RCA, the rabbinic organization of centrist Orthodoxy, recently dropped Rabbi Mark Kunis, who leads a 750-family congregation in Atlanta and co-chairs the Orthodox-Conservative rabbinical fellowship of the Union for Traditional Judaism.

Forum To Combat Racism

BRUSSELS — The European Parliament has decided to establish a branch of the London-based Inter-Parliamentary Council against Anti-Semitism.

This action stems from a call for a common struggle against anti-Semitism, a move made last month by Klaus Hansch, European Parliament president.

One of the objectives of the new group will be to establish legislation applicable to all European Union member states to combat both Holocaust denial and the distribution of anti-Semitic materials.

Holocaust Survivors Gather

MIAMI — Fifty years after the liberation of the Nazi death camps, some 4,000 Holocaust survivors gathered here to focus on the lives they built from scratch after the war.

The survivors used the opportunity to take pride in their accomplishments, and especially in their children and grandchildren.

University launches Jewish Studies chair

Waterloo begins fundraising drive

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The University of Waterloo has launched a fundraising drive to create a Chair in Jewish studies.

The estimated cost will be from $1.5 million to $2 million, disclosed Paul Socken, a member of the advisory committee and a professor of French literature at the university.

The first pledge has already been made. Alexander Raab, Czech Holocaust survivor and former proprietor of White Rose Nurseries, has promised $200,000. Last autumn, he gave the university the first instalment, a sum of $50,000.

Socken is sanguine that the campaign will succeed, and that the chair will be officially inaugurated within about two years.

But in the meantime, he and Roger Downer, the university's vice-president of development, are working closely together on fundraising strategies.

"Jewish studies at Waterloo, we hope, will bring together students and the community to an understanding of Jewish history, culture, civilization and religion," explained Socken, who lived in the Kitchener Waterloo area for 18 years before moving to Toronto five years ago.

"A major focus will be the impact of Judaism on world history and religion and the relationship between Jewish culture and Western civilization."

Fewer than 1,000 Jewish students

According to Socken, the university's interest in the project stems from a desire to fill "a real, serious gap" in its program.

The University of Waterloo, a major institution of higher learning in Ontario, has a student enrolment of approximately 22,000. Fewer than 1,000 of its students are said to be Jewish.

Paul Socken

Though its forte is science and engineering, its arts faculty is the largest on campus, Socken said.

The university is entering uncharted waters by trying to establish a Chair in Jewish studies. But Waterloo's religion department already offers a course in world religions, while some history and literature courses deal with fascism in Germany and with the Holocaust in general.

And for the past decade, the university has been the venue of the annual Spinoza Meir lecture on a Jewish topic.

Socken credits the university's dean of arts, Brian Hendley, for initiating the idea of a Chair in Jewish studies.

Last summer, Hendley saw Schindler's List, and was moved by the Steven Spielberg's Academy Award-winning film. Hendley approached Socken, the former president of Kitchener's Beth Jacob Congregation, and observed that some kind of Jewish studies program was overdue.

Lectures could be taped

He asked Socken to investigate the matter. Socken called Sydney Eisen, founder of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies. Eisen, in turn, suggested that York University's lectures on Jewish studies be taped and made available to Waterloo, which is known for its correspondence courses.

Meanwhile, Waterloo's president, Jim Downey, who had just returned from a trip to Israel in the company of other Canadian university presidents, expressed enthusiasm for the project.

Last fall, Downey convened a meeting to discuss it. He and his colleagues concluded that it was a feasible idea whose time had come.

Socken claims that "the whole concept" is a Christian initiative. "It's really an extraordinary development," he added.

St. Jerome's, a Catholic college affiliated with the university, has expressed strong interest and support for the Jewish Studies Chair, which will be filled once sufficent funds are at hand.

"St. Jerome's feels it's an important step in ecumenism and interfaith relations," said Socken.

Indeed, St. Jerome's has volunteered to house the Chair on its campus.

Droege convicted for aggravated assault

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Report

TORONTO — An Ontario Supreme Court judge last week found Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege guilty of aggravated assault for his part in a wild "pier 6 brawl" between white supremacists and members of an anti-racist group in June 1993.

Droege and Heritage Front supporter Peter Mitrevski were both acquitted on charges of possession of a weapon dangerous to the public peace.

Droege will be sentenced on March 9 by Justice David McCombs. The maximum sentence for the offence is 14 years in jail, though in setting the court date, McCombs told Crown prosecutor Philip Enright there appeared to be "mitigating circumstances" in the assault. Droege said he would appeal the conviction.

The street fight that triggered the charges took place in the early morning hours of June 12, 1993, when supporters of the white supremacist Heritage Front clashed with members of Anti-Racist Action (ARA) on College Street east of Bathurst.

The clash took place just hours after ARA members trashed the house of Gary Schipper, a Heritage Front member known as the voice behind the front's telephone message line. Court was told Heritage Front members went to Sneaky Dee's, a bar at College and Bathurst known to be frequented by ARA supporters, to "convey the message they wouldn't be intimidated," McCombs recounted.

In the melee that ensued, Droege struck Malcolm Sheppard, 23, with a heavy, metallic flashlight, fracturing his jaw. Prosecutors alleged that Mitrevski swung a carved wooden object at ARA members during the fight.

Defence lawyers Harry Doan, who represented Droege, and George Wooten, acting for Mitrevski, argued that their clients were acting in self defence in coming to the aid of a skinhead who was beset upon by about a dozen ARA supporters.

Crown attorney Philip Enright argued that both the Heritage Front and the ARA were "spoiling for a fight" that night and that there was no "air of reality" to the claim of self-defence.

McCombs said that after hearing all the evidence, he faced an almost "impossible task" to determine exactly what happened. But he said he was satisfied that Droege hit Sheppard on the side of the head while Sheppard was standing and at least once again after the victim staggered to the ground.

Tracing the events of the night, McCombs said he was satisfied by the evidence that Droege and Mitrevski were reacting to a perceived risk of bodily harm to Adrian Galineas, a skinhead who was being attacked by perhaps a dozen ARA members. Droege grabbed the flashlight from his car, which earlier testimony showed he used while executing his duties as a bailiff, McCombs said.

The judge also accepted Mitrevski's testimony that he was attacked by an ARA member with a three-foot stick, stripped him of it and "took possession of the weapon on the sudden." McCombs said he had a reasonable doubt whether Mitrevski used it for a dangerous purpose as alleged or in self defence.

Earlier in the four-day trial, Sheppard, an ARA-supporter who disavowed violence, testified that he was attempting to help a skinhead who was being attacked by other ARA people when he was assaulted. He said someone with a stick struck at him but only grazed him. He then saw Droege wield the flashlight like a baseball bat and hit him on the left side of his head. His body went numb and he fell.

Police Det. Const. Paul Cummins said he saw Droege hit Sheppard while the victim was on the ground. He arrested Droege moments later.

Other police evidence indicated ARA members were carrying empty bottles and other potential weapons and that there was the sound of bottles hitting the pavement during the melee. Droege claimed he was hit on the head and shoulder during the fight and later required medical attention.

At the start of the trial, McCombs rejected requests from Doan and Wooten to delay the case until Grant Bristow could be located. Last August, Bristow went into hiding after he was exposed as a Canadian Security Intelligence Service mole inside the Heritage Front. The defence contended he provoked confrontations with the ARA and was present the night of the brawl.

McCombs said there was no evidence that Bristow instigated the events on College Street.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer Fred M. Catzman has been researching their origins over the past few years. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

KUGELMASS

Claudia Kugelmass, an information officer of the Law Society of Upper Canada has a surname that is not only unusual but deceptive. The familiar meaning of the Jewish word Kugel is pudding.

It is also the German word for bullet or projectile and also designates the mercury ball in the thermometer.

Kugelmass literally means ball, calibre or shot gauge.

As a surname, I would be inclined to associate it with chemistry rather than with ballistics.

Continuity task force launched in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Western Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Task Force on Jewish continuity here is being launched with a weekend of presentations by Susan Jackson of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Jackson will first address the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) senior staff, concentrating on staff development and leadership, maintaining staff morale in view of proposed changes and how to deliver effective, efficient services in a time of declining budgets.

Friday evening, Jackson will deliver a sermon on Jewish parenting during services at the Reform Temple Shalom, and on Saturday morning, she will be at the Orthodox Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun after the Shabbat service, to talk about living Jewishly in the modern world.

Sunday morning she will lead representatives and officers of the city's Jewish organizations in defining what Jewish continuity means for Winnipeg. In the afternoon she will speak at the YMHA Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

Jackson is congress director of community services and youth activities for Ontario region. She is a recognized specialist on Jewish identity and continuity. Her visit to Winnipeg is sponsored by the WJCC, the YMHA JCC, the Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue, Temple Shalom, the Jewish Students Association and the Combined Jewish Appeal/Women's Division.

Tougher sentences urged for hate motivated crimes

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Proposed legislation to toughen sentences for crimes motivated by hate could go further, says the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

A league delegation presented its views last week before the standing committee on justice and legal affairs of the House of Commons, which is considering the new sentencing legislation.

Amendments to the Criminal Code announced last June by Justice Minister Alan Rock would allow judges to consider the "hate" dimension of crimes when they pass sentence. They would apply in cases where the victims were targeted because of their race, religion, sex or sexual orientation.

Reform and Bloc Quebecois members have challenged the victim categories, particularly sexual orientation, saying they are unnecessary. But Mark Sandler, senior legal counsel for the league, endorsed the wording of the legislation, saying specific victim categories must be spelled out to prevent the law's being trivialized by being invoked when hate is not really an issue.

The league also recommended several additions to the legislation.

- If a victim does not belong to one of the groups named in the legislation but was perceived by the attacker to belong to one of them, the provisions for longer sentences should still apply.
- Criminal records should show that a crime was motivated by hate.
- The proposed sentencing provisions in the Criminal Code should also apply to the Young Offenders Act, particularly because so many of the people active in hate groups are teenagers.
- Membership in hate groups should be criminalized. At the same time, Sandler stressed, to protect the Charter's right of freedom of association, this provision would apply only to hate groups that have criminal objectives, such as attacking minorities.
- A new offence, called institutional vandalism, should be included in the bill to cover the desecration of graveyards, synagogues and churches. Currently, people who vandalise religious institutions are charged with mischief, an offence in the same category as ripping the antenna from cars. Sandler said the mischief charge grossly undervalues the seriousness of crimes against sacred buildings and sites.
- Holocaust denial should become an offence under the Criminal Code.

Water seen as key ingredient for peace

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Water is as important to a lasting Israeli-Palestinian peace as territory and security, according to David Brooks.

Discussing his new book, Watershed: The Role of Fresh Water in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, at Temple Israel recently, Brooks said that since 1967, Israel has controlled the underground water supply in the West Bank, but sharing the region's scarce water supply is both possible and critical to the peace process.

Director of the Environment Policy Program of the International Development Research Centre and a member of Canada's delegation to the Middle East peace talks, Brooks co-wrote the book with Stephen Lonergan, a geography professor at the University of Victoria.

Brooks said the book shows that Israel is reaching a water crisis, with demand outstripping supply because:

• While it is a leader in water recycling, Israel has fallen behind in water conservation. For decades Israel has recycled waste water to irrigate crops but has made little effort to save water through cutting edge efficiency programs.

"The best Israeli water engineers now work in Asia," Brooks said.

Every year Israel loses water to pollution because of fertilizer and pesticide use.

• Despite the folklore that Israel has an agricultural economy, it is in fact an industrial country. Agriculture accounts for only five per cent of GNP yet consumes two-thirds of the water supply. Since water falls under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Agriculture, pricing policies have long favored farmers, with Israelis paying five to 10 times less for water than it costs to produce it.

Since 1967, Israel has encouraged irrigation by offering new settlements in the West Bank the same low water rates as in the rest of Israel. Palestinians pay much more than Israelis and are only allowed to drill wells for drinking water.

• Some water sources are already threatened. The coastal aquifer has been drained so much that sea water is beginning to seep in. Other water sources cross international boundaries; tapping them will require effective negotiations with all countries in the region.

After studying the politics of water, Brooks said he and Lonergan did find areas for compromise.

To avert a water and political crisis, he made these suggestions:

Water management should have its own government ministry to reduce the focus on water for crops. An environment ministry should monitor water pollution and controls. Prices, which rose substantially in Israel's last budget, should continue to reflect the real cost of water.

Israel can reduce the amount of food it grows. The country already has a huge agricultural surplus. Less agriculture means less water siphoned off for irrigation.

Israel will have to negotiate joint control over water sources with the Palestinians, as it unofficially has with Jordan for many years.

Israel is urged to find alternatives

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Israel must release some of its water supply to the Palestinians for the peace process to be successful, an Ottawa environmentalist said.

Speaking to a breakfast club of Shaar Shalom Synagogue recently, David Brooks said Israel can shift to using saline or recycled water for the remainder of its dwindling agricultural industry.

"Israel and the Palestinians may come to be world leaders in developing options for water management," he said.

Brooks admitted Israel has grown up with water projects and has been a model of water development. It "has made the desert bloom," he said.

"But Israel [now] faces three kinds of water problems — quantity, in that it is using more than it has; quality, in that its water supply is declining year by year because of pollution; and political, in that water flows across boundaries, specifically where the underground tableland spreads between Israel and the West Bank."

He added the ideology of Israel as a nation built on land development is important, but "Israel has a budget crisis like everyone else."

Polls indicate Israelis recognize the need to deal with the water issue and realize that Israelis have lost touch with farming. Israel's strong environmental movement is winning major battles with government.

Brooks said there are many ways to negotiate. "And there is enough water for both Israel and the West Bank. I'm optimistic that there will be flexibility in everyone's thinking."

CJC Pacific region submits resolutions for May plenary

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region has submitted a number of resolutions to the national resolutions committee for debate at the plenary assembly in Montreal in May.

• Pacific region wants authority from national CJC to seek alternate sources of funding "to enhance local programming without its base budget being affected."

In the current system, CJC is funded through the National Budgeting Conference. Congress then funds activities of the regions, which are not encouraged to do their own fundraising.

Zena Simses Katz, chair of the regional resolutions committee, says Pacific region wants funding "to more accurately reflect our growing needs."

Last year, the region had to obtain funds from the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and its endowment fund to help finance a Western conference in Vancouver.

• Congress should continue its commitment to multiculturalism which, Pacific region says, has been under direct attack by some groups who want to kill multiculturalism or water it down, or confuse it with individual human and civil rights.

• With regard to the status of women, CJC-P proposes resolutions governing the difficulty of getting a get and promoting awareness in the community that 56 per cent of all Jewish poor are women.

• Congress should encourage service agencies to investigate and provide assistance to Jewish families where emotional or physical violence is occurring. This resolution was proposed by the National Council of Jewish Women.

• Several resolutions deal with the need to combat hate propaganda and bias crime in cooperation with government; to condemn anti-Semitism "wherever and whenever it occurs;" and to promote awareness in the general community that Holocaust denial is false, and an affront to survivors and to all Jews.

CJC should call on all attorneys general to collect, synthesize and share information about bias crimes, and to monitor racist groups and individuals to make sure they are not ignoring criminal codes and human rights legislation.

Advt.

Making the going easier

The Institute for Community Education and Referral, conceived and funded by Benjamin's, was created in 1986. Benjamin's felt that the sanctity of life demonstrated in treatment of the deceased had to be reflected in greater care for the living as well. The Institute fills, in part, the vacuum left by vanishing traditions of community support for people adjusting to great or sudden personal loss.

The Institute serves as an educational resource on death, funeral practices and Jewish laws and traditions, in addition to helping with needed attention. Individuals or families served by the Chapel may receive clinical assessments, short-term psychological support or referrals to accredited professionals upon request or at the suggestion of the director at the time arrangements are made. Counselling costs are either fully borne or subsidized by Benjamin's to reduce any barrier to help.

Several mailings describing the Institute's services are sent out well after a funeral. Some people need time before recognizing the need for, or accepting professional help. Families occasionally contact the agency for help in coping before a loss occurs. Whatever information or clinical services may be required, the Benjamin Institute is a unique community resource dedicated to facilitating the way life goes on.

Sunquest cancels its charter plans to fly to Israel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sunquest Vacations Ltd. has shelved its plans to fly a weekly charter from Toronto to Israel, a service that was to have begun in May.

Instead, the Toronto-based mass market travel wholesaler announced last week that it has signed a three-year renewal of its contract with the Israeli carrier El Al Israel Airlines worth $15 million. Under the contract, El Al will continue for three more years as the featured carrier in Sunquest's year-round Israel program.

"We are very pleased to have reached this agreement with El Al," said Sunquest executive Eddie Carroll in a prepared statement to the media. "We have enjoyed an excellent relationship with El Al since 1992 and look forward to continuing our mutually profitable relationship in the future."

It has been barely two months since Israel's Civil Aviation Authority, in keeping with the government's new "open skies" policy, approved Sunquest's request to operate the charter, thus breaking El Al's long-held monopoly on direct flights between Canada and Israel.

Underplaying the profitability of the Canadian market, El Al initially threatened to quit Canada altogether if the Sunquest charter was approved. But the airline's bluff did not prevent officials of Israel's aviation authority from deciding in Sunquest's favor; nor did it deter Air Canada from announcing a new twice-weekly service to Israel, commencing in June.

Despite the heat of the sudden competition, El Al has done everything but leave the proverbial kitchen. Instead, it has lowered fares and announced that it will bolster its Monday and Wednesday service from Toronto and Montreal with a third flight on Sundays. Air Canada, too, has plans to add a third weekly flight to Israel.

Fares, meanwhile, have taken an unprecedented tumble. Last year, El Al's lowest published fare was $1,338. Since January, travel agents have offered discounted return flights for as low as $849. But now that Sunquest is not undercutting the competition with a charter flight, fares may climb somewhat to a median level, since El Al's main competition, Air Canada, pursues what corporate spokesperson Kym Robertson calls "a higher yield strategy." Air Canada's lowest fare for a return direct flight from Toronto to Tel Aviv is $1,159.

Despite the cancellation of Sunquest's charter, Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, said she expects the reduced fares and added capacity on direct flights to entice many more Canadians than the 40,000 who visited in 1994.

"Competition is good for the consumer — no one will change this idea in my mind," she said. "You have to give people choice. You can't say, 'Here is the product, take it or leave it.' I'm very glad to see this price breakthrough in Canada."

Yona Nechustan, general manager and vice-president of El Al in Canada, expressed delight that the Sunquest contract has been renewed. "We have had three very successful years with Sunquest Vacations and look forward to considerable growth in this second phase," he said. "I'm convinced it will be very good for Israel and El Al."

The President and Ecclesiastes

Writing in Le Devoir last week, author Yves Beauchemin passionately exhorted fellow Quebecois to finally choose sovereignty. It was his view that "the risks of remaining in Canada are infinitely more grave than those of leaving."

The nub of the federalist argument rests on the ability to prove to Beauchemin the very opposite, to prove that a proud, confident, vibrant, thriving, self-determining French-language culture and way of life can be well maintained in Quebec within a federal framework. Ironically, on the very day that the article appeared in Le Devoir, the visit by President Bill Clinton to Ottawa suggested a federalist argument which is very compelling.

Clinton spoke admiringly about Canada. But it was not in his words of praise that a strong federalist message can be found. For the sentiments were expected, even if worthy. Rather, it was in his speculation about the future that federalism can make a strong case to counter Beauchemin's cri de coeur. "I come here today to reaffirm the ties that bind the United States and Canada in a new age of great promise and challenge, a time of rapid change when both opportunity and uncertainty live side by side ..."

When the president spoke about "a new age" and about "a time of rapid change," he had in mind a time, which most of us can already imagine, characterized by disappearing economic borders, internetic cyber travel, instantaneous electronic communications, and CNNed, blurry cultural differences. What the president did not say is what we already know: that the economic, intellectual, social and cultural tug from the United States is weighty and inexorable.

But it is not insurmountable.

To better resist that tug in a time of rapid change, both Canada and Quebec will stand a better chance if joined. Canada's uniqueness is predicated in part, on the synthesis and the synergy between the English and the French cultures, while Quebec's cultural resilience has developed in large measure as an antidote to the rest of Canada. Without Quebec, a fragmented Canada may fragment even futher to natural north/south economic tides. And without Canada, a small Quebec of seven million people or less will feel even smaller in a predominantly English-speaking North America of almost 300 million people.

Beauchemin wrote that "memory is the foundation of wisdom." In this the Jewish community agrees with him entirely; memory has been the sustaining vehicle of all our traditions. Thus we offer the words of Ecclesiastes as a feasible federalist formula:

"Two are better than one because they have a good reward for their labor. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow; but woe to him that is alone when he falls, and does not have another to lift him up."

Assad's double game

The U.S. State Department announced last week that Secretary of State Warren Christopher will be returning to the Middle East in the near future in an effort to reinvigorate and advance negotiations between Israel and Syria. Usually, according to the rules of high profile, high visibility diplomacy, that means sufficient behind-the-scenes progress has already been achieved to warrant the public announcement and the trip.

But over the years, Hafez al-Assad has shown that he pays scant regard to rules. He plays a double game of pronouncement and ploy. President Bill Clinton unfortunately found this out for himself when, at their meeting in October, Assad refused to publicly condemn the use of terror, in spite of a clear understanding he had earlier fostered with the president that he would.

Last month, while in Washington, Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres accused Syria of sheltering at least 10 terrorist organizations opposed to peace with Israel. He was merely stating the already obvious. Syria's role in providing headquarters, training grounds, weapons, logistical support, finances and diplomatic assistance to extremists and radicals has been known to members of Congress for decades. Peres plaintively asked his Washington audience: "How can Syria advance toward peace while permitting terrorist operations?" This is an excellent question, one, indeed, that we share. It demands an answer not from the U.S. secretary of state, but rather from Assad himself. It demands that the Syrian ruler expel the terrorists.

Severely buffeted by the Beit Lid bombings, the people of Israel will measure the truth of his answer by his deeds alone.

Observe victory and liberation

Rabbi Erwin Schild, in his guest column of Feb. 9, expresses uneasiness, saying the community commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Liberation and Holocaust Remembrance (April 30 to May 1) must not be turned exclusively "into an extended Yom Hashoah," thereby overlooking the victory in Europe.

Those planning this special anniversary, were guided from the very beginning by considerations similar to those of Rabbi Schild. This is why, as a central component of the overall program, an event has been scheduled at Queen's Park at 1:30 p.m., April 30, specifically to mark VE Day, the liberation of the continent and of the survivors, and the defeat of Nazism. The ocasion also will honor the sacrifice and heroism of the Canadian Armed Forces, including the many Jewish men and women who served, and of the partisans and the ghetto fighters, and will pay tribute to the courage of the survivors.

The Queen's Park ceremony, most particularly, is intended for the public-at-large, Jewish and non-Jewish. It will be attended by government leaders and other elected officials, diplomats, members of the Canadian military, and veterans. We urge that as many members of our community as possible participate at Queen's Park and at the various other programs of our two-day commemoration, which is meant not only for survivors, but for everyone.

Was Alexander Hamilton really Levine?

Alexander Hamilton, the American statesman, lawyer, soldier, banker (he founded the Bank of New York), and according to my dictionary, "a darkly handsome man who has been given credit as a founder and molder of the United States," was born in 1757 in Nevis in the West Indies with the surname of Levine. Is there anyone who can explain the transition that caused him to change his name?

Don't tag violence as senseless

David Newman, in his "Perspective" (CJN, Feb. 16) refers to the "senseless terrorism and violence" currently threatening Israel.

Without wishing to diminish the gravity of the problem, I would like to ask, What is senseless about it? I have noticed lately a general inability by social and political commentators to refrain from attaching the adjective "senseless" to the noun "violence."

The results are unfortunate, in two respects: First, there is an implication that the violence is somehow worse for being "senseless" or random or counter-productive. Would we prefer to suffer violence that was sensible, well thought out and effective? The second and more important implication is that the terror or violence does not make any sense. Certainly the terror campaign against Israel makes perfect sense in the eyes of those who are waging it, and even appears to have accomplished some of its major purpose, casting doubt on the wisdom of the peace process.

To regard this violence as senseless, then, is to ignore its obvious purpose. Whether the current wave of violence will ultimately succeed in its purpose is, thankfully, still open to doubt, but no one should regard it as senseless, any more than we should regard the "acts of senseless violence" that occasionally erupt in our own society as lacking purpose. Construing these acts as senseless provides an easy excuse for failing to understand and combat their underlying rationale.

Income ceiling in reparations

I read with great interest the letter by Mrs. Rose Gerendasi, Toronto "Don't put income ceiling on reparation." (CJN, Feb. 9)

I am one of the few survivors of the KZ Auschwitz-Birkenau, who escaped the Russian-occupied former Czechoslovakia Republic in 1968 and settled in Canada.

I fully agree with Mrs. Gerendasi. Surely we are supposed to be compensated for the hardship and suffering we went through in the concentration camps of Nazi Germany, regardless of our present income. No monetary compensation can compensate us for what we went through anyway.

Border closings are justified

Some regard Israel's border closings to thousands of Palestinian workers after the latest suicide bombing at Beit Lid as "unfair collective punishment."

What is not mentioned is that a survey conducted by the Palestinian Centre For Public Opinion two days after the Beit Lid bombing claims 53 per cent of Palestinians asked said they would like to see more of this kind of "military action."

If that's the case, it would be suicide for Israel to allow Arab workers back into Israel, allowing extremists another opportunity to plan and carry out another attack.

Israel has every right to protect its people from these murderous attacks.

Those who claim economic changes in the territories will erode popular support for these extremists, may be right, but this is long term.

The present reality continues to be intolerable and calls for immediate remedies. For now Israel has chosen passive resistance to these acts of violence.

THE O.J. SIMPSON PHENOMENON

Murder trial becomes a ratings game

Just a few weeks ago, the national headquarters of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) in Toronto sent a fax to our office containing the menu for the Senior Shabbaton we were hosting in our shul.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

The breakfast menu was very simple — OJ and breakfast! What wonderful innocence on the part of the NCSY leadership. They actually recall that O.J. once meant "orange juice."

But not any more. Now, O.J. means only one thing — money! Yes, that is correct — money.

TV stations that dare to be skimpy on coverage of the O.J. circus learn almost immediately that their ratings go down the same drain as surplus OJ (orange juice, that is).

Hardly a day passes when the latest about O.J. is not the lead item on most major news programs. It takes something earth-shattering, like the Kobe earthquake, to dislodge O.J. from the top.

And book publishers know that the best way to produce an instant best-seller is to publish a book about O.J. Three of the top sellers in the non-fiction (why there?) category are books about O.J. The best-seller is a book by O.J. about O.J.

Why has this "trial-of-the-century" generated so much interest? It is easy to blame the media, but all evidence points to the uncomfortable yet unavoidable conclusion that the media was the effect rather than the cause, at least insofar as O.J. mania is concerned.

The baseball and hockey strikes helped. There was no real live entertainment, so O.J. filled the void. And if you watch the coverage, it all plays like a sports match.

One major weekly news magazine awards weekly points to the prosecution and defense, depending on their performances. Another has an "instant replay" type of program, with audience participation both in studio and on the phone.

The ingenuity of the media in the O.J. sweepstakes is nothing short of amazing. Just when you think every angle has been covered, uncovered and recovered, new angles to further arouse interest are concocted.

We have had everything from exposes of Marcia Clark to internal bickering within the defense "team" (yes, folks, O.J. the running back is now playing defense), to analysis of who won the opening round, to debate about the time it takes ice cream to melt, to psychological scrutiny of the jury as an attempt to discern how they are leaning.

By chance, I caught a CNN conversation with some folks who attended "Opening Day" of baseball spring training. One older person was asked why he came to watch mere replacement players and he gave a truly all-American answer.

"What's the difference? It's still baseball. And besides, I would even come just to watch the grass grow. What else does a person like me have to do?"

There you have it — the real reason why O.J. has captured the American imagination. What else do so many have to do? And it beats watching the grass grow.

I cannot help but recall the famous Talmudic observation that "idleness leads to mental decay" (Ketubot, 56b). Indeed, idleness creates the desperation for something to fill in the time, and O.J. watching fills the gap.

Although this may not be as destructive as other offerings on the screen or tube, it is nevertheless painful testimony to the void and vacuum that exists in the lives of many.

And when you wonder why there is so much crime, violence, hatred and abuse, you need look no further than at that vacuum to know from whence it stems.

We yearn for the day when O.J. will mean orange juice.

Media coverage is no big deal

What does the coverage of the O.J. Simpson trial say about the media and our lives? While I think I'm going to disappoint some people with my answer, I don't think it says much of anything. I've got no blanket condemnation of the way the media are covering this event. I mean, for goodness sake, Simpson is probably the most famous man ever charged with murder. Why wouldn't there be a ton of coverage, both relevant and accurate, or stupid and irresponsible?

Steve Paikin

I've watched a great deal of the Simpson trial, everything from "live" coverage of the courtroom, to Nightline, to the prime time current affairs show, to those sickening half-hour tabloid TV shows.

The vast majority of what I have seen has been informative, interesting and useful in helping me understand history's most famous murder case.

There have been excesses, as there always are when the world's collective attention is drawn to such a sensational story. I find I just can't condemn people for showing more interest in this story than the latest review of Canadian agricultural policy.

But there is one exception to my generous attitude to the way the media have covered the Simpson trial. It relates to humor.

I can't stand journalists making light of this case. I hate it when I see an anchor "debriefing" a reporter on the scene, and they share a little laugh at the end of the report.

Recently, I heard a discussion of this case on a noon-hour radio show. After the discussion, the host quipped with a chuckle in her voice that she'd be sure to have lots of popcorn and goodies ready, in preparation for the next day's testimony.

Perhaps not a grievous faux pas, but it disgusted me. Two people are dead. They practically had their heads cut off. And apparently, some respected journalists find that grist for the humor mill.

Sorry. Tell your O.J. jokes in private or leave 'em to Saturday Night Live. I'm sure the Brown and Goodman families will be delighted to know that you find their misery worthy of your best one-liners.

Here's how we've handled this on Studio 2. Recently, one of my colleagues suggested we open our program by introducing the hosts, then saying we're "an O.J.-free zone," in effect joking that, unlike every other television program, we're not going to talk about O.J.

No blanket condemnation of mass media

I objected. I acknowledged before everyone at the editorial meeting that maybe I was being too sensitive on this point, but I didn't want to be associated with anything that appeared to be making light of the brutal stabbing of two people.

It was the shortest argument I've ever had with anyone at TVO. The others yielded, and I'm happy to say we never used the line. Maybe a small victory, but I thought a victory for good taste nevertheless.

So there it is. No blanket condemnation of the mass media or the people immersing themselves in this story. One large irritation. But actually, plenty of responsible coverage to be pleased with, particularly on CNN and Nightline. I've learned a lot.

And I look forward to more of the same, as the most famous man ever charged with murder moves closer to a verdict.

Comparative law: DNA use and Halachah

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

Included in the evidence the prosecution will enter against O. J. Simpson, the alleged murderer of his wife and her friend, are DNA samples of the victims and the accused which match the DNA of blood found at the murder scene, in Simpson's car and on clothing.

Closer to home, Guy Paul Morin, incarcerated for 10 years for the murder of his young neighbor Christine Jessop, was released when recent DNA tests on evidence showed he was not the guilty party.

The use of DNA in trials is a controversial issue in the civil courts. Is such evidence admissible according to Jewish law? Is DNA reliable?

Although the discovery of DNA and its use in courts is relatively recent, rabbinic authorities have already relied on such distinctive characteristics as fingerprints to verify the identities of individuals. (See Responsa Yabia Omer, VI, Even Haezer, no. 3.)

It is assumed that DNA is as unique as fingerprints. As such, DNA can be used as credible means of identification. Even were we to accept the argument that not enough samples have yet been studied to definitively determine that no two individuals share the same DNA structure (except identical twins), Jewish law is not concerned with what would certainly be a miuta de-miuta (a statistically insignificant possibility). (See Responsa Chatam Sofer, Yoreh Deah, no. 338; Responsa Maharitz Chayot, no. 52.)

Is DNA admissible? Generally speaking, the Torah requires the testimony of two valid eyewitnesses in order to convict an alleged perpetrator (Deuternonomy 17:6, 19:15). Nevertheless, in tort, monetary and personal status cases, circumstantial evidence may be admissible.

Consider, for example, the case of witnesses outside a room who observe two people enter and exit the room. On entering, both parties are uninjured. Upon exiting, one has bruises and wounds. The presence of the witnesses, although not wholly determinate, is a significant factor in holding the aggressor responsible. If, in addition to the presence of the witnesses, the injury was of such a nature and in such a location that it could not be self-inflicted (for example, a bite on the middle of his back), such circumstantial evidence is sufficient to convict. (Rambam, Hil. Chovel uMazik 5:4-5)

Authorities have also ruled that paternity can be established by blood tests and consider such findings more trustworthy than the traditional testimony of witnesses. (See Rabbi Abraham Price, Mishnat Avraham I, no. 291.)

However, in capital cases such as murder, circumstantial evidence is not admissible in Jewish law. Not only must two eyewitnesses be present, but they must properly forewarn the perpetrator before he commits his crime. Thus, while DNA evidence may raise sufficient doubt to lead to the acquittal of an accused, it is not sufficient to convict him. Even if scientific tests of evidence would indicate a person was present at the scene of a murder and all indications would point to the guilt of that individual, without two valid eyewitnesses to the actual commission of the crime, Torah law prohibits conviction.

Now, most murders are not committed in the presence of two valid witnesses. Does this mean that murderers go free? The Mishnah, Sanhedrin 81b, rules that if the court is otherwise convinced the accused committed murder, even though the Torah's requirements of testimony have not been fulfilled, he can be imprisoned. Beyond that, a court has the authority, if the welfare of society depends upon it, to administer punishment beyond that which the Torah prescribes and to accept testimony which the Torah otherwise disallows. (Rambam, Hil. Sanhedrin 24:4-9). Thus, the need to protect society from a murderer may be sufficient grounds to accept DNA and other circumstantial evidence that convinces the court of the accused's guilt.

Is O. J. guilty? The jury has yet to decide, and DNA will certainly be a significant issue in its deliberations. When the trial is finally over, perhaps we'll find the time once again to spend on work and with our families and friends.

Opinions

Rabbis don't know all

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

On Jan. 19, I woke up to a front-page headline in the Globe and Mail. It proclaimed: "Experts divided on what the dollar is worth." Underneath it said:

The pessimist: If looney loses, Friedberg wins.

The optimist: Plaut calls Canada "a high-grade developed country."

The name Plaut is not particularly common in Canada, there being only a few of us and all of us members of the same family. I must admit I have said many things in my life — and not all of them necessarily supported by later developments — but this one has had me puzzled.

Looking across to the pessimist side, I noticed that not only had I pronounced on public matters of finance, but so, apparently, had Rabbi Friedberg, rabbi emeritus of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto and my old friend and neighbor.

How come two rabbis were quoted on the front page on matters not specifically in their areas of expertise? It turned out the Friedberg referred to was not the rabbi, but another Torontonian, Albert, who did not even belong to Beth Tzedec Congregation, so I am told.

And the Plaut in question was Peter Plaut of New York, who appears on my wife's genealogical charts somewhere but cannot be claimed as a relative.

I write all of this in order to quash the rumors which have since developed, that the boards of trustees of the two neighboring congregations in Toronto, Beth Tzedec and Holy Blossom, have put their former rabbis forward in order to ignite a neighborly controversy and call attention to the wide-ranging knowledge of past and current spiritual leadership.

So calm down, there's no substance to a Friedberg vs. Plaut rabbinic controversy—not on the issue of currency anyway.

Sifting through old effects

The Globe and Mail was not the only newspaper that came to hand this last week while I was sifting through old effects. Somehow I had saved the front page of the Daily Hebrew Journal of Feb. 21, 1962. In bold letters it proclaimed:

Amerikaner astronaut matsli'ach — kreisst arum dem kadur ha-aretz drei moh! un kimt besholom tzurik gesunt un frish.

The Yiddish headline dealt with John Glenn (now an Ohio senator). "American astronaut succeeds — circles the earth three times and comes back in peace, hale and healthy."

Anyone wishing this old copy may get it from my secretary — first come, first served; there's only this one copy.

Recently I described our family's first visit to Israel, back in the spring of 1956.

Now a copy of an old New York Herald-Tribune comes to hand which published a special supplement in April of that year. The headline reads "Israel marks its eighth anniversary," and the sub-head, "New country is advancing to prosperity."

Israel was then as now governed by a coalition, with David Ben-Gurion, then 69 years of age, as prime minister.

In those days they had Independence Day parades and that year it was held in Haifa. A friend of mine had an office overlooking the major route, and I still remember how Ben-Gurion's car got stuck in front of some obstacle. But some young men were at hand and in a jiffy they had lifted the automobile and the prime minister was on his way. How was I to know that some years later, when he died, I would be privileged to be the Canadian present at his funeral in Sde Boker.

Jewish reality bites

"Who am I? I'm Jean Valjean," sang Prisoner 24601.

"I am woman," declaims Helen Reddy.

Jean M. Gerber

What is their issue, as today's generation says? Their issue is identity — "Who am I, where do I fit in?"

The current trend in Jewish life is to scrutinize Jewish identity and hope it will define a new generation of Jews. Optimists point with pride to Hillel groups, youth activities, camps and Israel experiences in increasing quantity and quality. Pessimists point with alarm to census trends in Canada, where we smugly hide our unease at disaffiliation (another term for decreasing community participation) behind assurances that Canadian Jews are "more traditional," "closer to the immigrant experience," and more stable than our cousins to the south.

I have used these arguments myself and frankly, even when I used them, I knew they were not the whole truth but a bite out of Jewish reality.

Recently my daughter took me to see Realty Bites, Hollywood's take on identity. I urge every parent, community worker, rabbi and Hebrew school teacher to run to the nearest video outlet for this movie.

Reality Bites is a unique window into the soul of young Jews. Why? Because the answer of the coming generation to the question, "Who am I?" is not very comforting.

"Who are you to tell me what I must be?" they ask us. "Why should one history or tradition be forced on me, when I have an infinity of identities and experiences to choose from. A bite here, a bite there, I will create myself anew. As a unique individual, I have that right."

In other words, young Jews are taking bites out of their experiences and attempting to create a reality. And increasingly, that reality will be unlike the reality of their parents and teachers.

Treacherous times

For parents to hear this at any time is distressing. Each family has identities, experiences and allegiances it believes are worthy of perpetuating through their children. For Jewish parents, indeed for the whole Jewish community, to hear this is to hear the sound of a community identity crumbling.

No labels, they insist. Reality is bad, but that is all there is. I must become who I am through the here and now. Who I will be is for me alone to determine.

These are treacherous times for Jews in North America. Our successes have turned into floods of praise for our accomplishments but we face the failure of traditional constraints on our need for family, history and persecution that has bound us together.

No trip to Israel, camp experience, 12-year day school experience and home observances assure the identity of the next generation of Jews. Yet at the same time, we want desperately to explain what it is that links us with the past and promises a communal future. I only call attention to the deep bite of reality. Before we propose solutions, we should at least recognize that reality.

Jean M. Gerber is a longtime community worker in Vancouver.

Righting past wrongs

By Arnold Ages

On New Year's day in 1923, a white mob attacked the 120 black residents of the tiny hamlet of Rosewood, near Cedar Key, Florida. After a fruitless search for a black man who had allegedly assaulted a white woman, the mob destroyed every home and building in the area over several days. Six blacks were killed during the mob action.

On Jan. 22, 1995, the state legislature of Florida acknowledged that it had failed to protect the black families of Rosewood and awarded $2 million in compensation to nine aged survivors, who were children when the rampage took place 72 years ago. When final adjudication claims are concluded the financial compensation may be higher.

The decision by the Florida legislature came after decades of strenuous lobbying by various black coalitions who fought for financial redress of wrongs done to the Rosewood community. Initially, petitioners were rebuffed by all state agencies who felt no responsibility, financial or otherwise, for acts committed during another period in American history.

What is the connection between this news item and the reality of Canadian society today?

In early January, Ottawa announced that, to its regret, it could not financially compensate Canadian members of the Chinese and Ukrainian communities for earlier wrongs done to them in this country. The government is willing to acknowledge the injustice of the poll tax which was obligatory for Chinese immigrants to Canada early in this century. It also recognizes the incivilities directed against Ukrainian immigrants to Canada, some of whom were interned as enemy aliens during World War I. The government is ready to offer apologies but nothing more.

This response is disappointing and contrary to the principles of elementary ethics. Democratic governments in parliamentary systems inherit benefits and obligations contracted by former administrations. They also inherit liabilities. Governments may protest, but they cannot summarily dismiss the deficits of their predecessors, by arguing that they are not responsible for past fiscal misdeeds.

Benefits, obligations inherited

Similarly, Ottawa should not dismiss the legitimate demands of Canadians who want more than a mea culpa nod for wrongs committed against them in the past. The degrading imposition of a poll tax on Chinese immigrants 80 years ago was a blatantly discriminatory act based on racial prejudice and designed to prevent the Chinese from coming to Canada. The internment of loyal Canadian Ukrainians in 1917 was fueled by a bias against eastern Europeans.

A contrast should be drawn between Ottawa's position and that of the German government. Fifty years after the end of World War II, Bonn continues, after having already paid out $57 billion, to furnish pension and compensation benefits for the victims of Nazi barbarism.

Of course, there can be no comparison between the Nazis' murder of Jews, Gypsies and other groups during the war, and Canada's treatment of Chinese and Ukrainian immigrants to this country. The latter suffered discrimination — not the brutalities and horrors of the death camps.

What can be compared, however, is the principle of accountability. Spokespersons for the German government told this writer several years ago, during a visit to officials in the foreign office, that while not all Germans were happy with the reparations arrangements, the German government considered it a matter of honor to reaffirm its responsibility to victims of Nazism. That responsibility would continue to be translated into financial reparations, even though the officials acknowledged that they could never make up for the horrors visited upon the victims.

In light of these examples, the Canadian government should re-examine its policies towards righting the wrongs of the past. The decision, a few years ago, to award compensation to Japanese Canadians for their internment on the West Coast during World War II, should be extended to Chinese, Ukrainian and other groups seeking redress for the indignities they suffered. It is our obligation as Canadians to recognize our responsibility for the sins of previous governments.

Centre promotes better understanding

Sheldon Kirshner recently visited a centre in Haifa which promotes and nurtures Jewish-Arab amity.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Due to its proximity to the largest concentration of Arabs in Israel, a special responsibility has been thrust upon Haifa University.

Upwards of 70 per cent of Israeli Arabs live in the Galilee, the gateway to which is Haifa. As a result, there are more Arab students — and faculty — at Haifa University than at all other universities in Israel combined.

Arabs — be they Muslim, Christian or Druse — comprise about 18 per cent of the student body, the same proportion as in Israel's overall population.

Recognizing this demographic imperative, and aware of the fact that relations between Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs can stand improvement, Haifa University took it upon itself to establish the Jewish-Arab Centre in the early 1970s — the first of its kind anywhere in the world.

The centre fulfils several functions. It tries to promote better Arab-Jewish understanding and cooperation on campus and beyond. And through the Gustav Heinemann Institute of Middle Eastern Studies, it furthers academic research on a wide variety of topics, particularly related to the Israeli Arab community.

One of the centre's most important tasks is to prepare first-year Arab students for the rigors and demands of university, explained Amatzia Baram, a former deputy director of the Jewish-Arab Centre and a historian specializing in Iraq.

All too often, rote learning is the preferred method of instruction at Arab schools. When Arab high school graduates reach university, they are at a distinct disadvantage because universties expect something more than the mere repetition of facts. It is assumed that they will have an inquiring and flexible mind and be able to analyse a text, which is not always the case. Arab students, too, tend to be weaker in Hebrew and English language skills.

To help them overcome these problems, the centre offers a multi-disciplinary preacademic program designed to assist them to achieve academic parity. As well, the centre awards scholarships and grants to outstanding students.

According to Baram, the program works. "By the third year, they have almost caught up," he said. "And in post-graduate studies, they are absolutely great."

Although Jews and Arabs live fairly close together, they barely know each other, giving rise to a belief in mutual stereotypes and suspicion and even hostility.

The centre attempts to bridge this gap with a program of organized interaction, through the Willi Eichler Students' Club. The club organizes special lectures and discussions, Hebrew and Arabic language courses, book fairs, film festivals, theatrical presentations and social outings.

The centre also played a role in defusing tensions during the height of the intifadah, or Palestinian uprising in the territories, in the late 1980s.

"In a few instances, Arab and Jewish students came to blows, though they recognized the sanctity of the classroom and never turned it into a battleground," recalled Baram.

In response to the strain, an Arab-Jewish committee was formed. It set out rules and regulations governing political activity on campus. "This was surprisingly successful," said Baram. "Tensions subsided considerably."

Just as importantly, the centre has sponsored encounters between Arab and Jewish politicians, enabling them to air their differences, and subsidized workshops on employment opportunities for Arabs in the Jewish sector.

Amatzia Baram

The encounters serve a practical purpose, driving home the point that Arab municipalities do not receive their fair share of government funding, while the workshops give prospective Arab graduates a better insight into the job market.

"The whole idea is to usher in more equality, full equality," said Baram, referring to the discrimination that dogs Arabs in Israel. "Our challenge is to convince Jewish employers to hire Arab graduates. It hasn't been easy. Our success has been limited."

Faced with the choice of an Arab or a Jewish graduate, a Jewish employer will invariably select the latter, Baram acknowledged.

More often than not, he added, an Arab has a better chance to find employment in Haifa than, say, in Tel Aviv. "Arab-Jewish relations in Haifa — an ethnically mixed city — are basically good."

In Baram's view, Palestinian nationalism has had a marked impact on Israeli Arabs. "The vast majority now consider themselves Palestinians with Israeli citizenship. I can see why it's so difficult for them."

Nevertheless, Israeli Arabs see their future in Israel — not in a Palestinian state. "From my conversations with them, they are loyal to Israel, provided Israel is not killing Palestinians [in the territories]. I haven't heard from them an explicit call for Israel's destruction, though I have heard some melodies that could be interpreted as such. Their basic inclination is to integrate into Israeli society."

Despite their complaints about being second-class citizens, Israeli Arabs have achieved administrative, cultural and religious autonomy, he noted.

Looking ahead, Baram believes that the mistrust between Jews and Arabs will dissipate if the current Arab-Israeli peace process succeeds.

Through the Gustav Heinemann Institute of Middle East Studies, the centre has published books and monographs that are held in high regard by scholars around the globe.

Not surprisingly, there is a pronounced emphasis on research regarding the history and status of Israeli Arabs. Sammy Smooha is compiling a database on the topic. Majid al-Haj is engaged in a project on Arab employment patterns and education. Kais Firro and Faiz Azzam are documenting Israel's Druse community.

Arab and Jewish students meet at the Jewish-Arab Centre.

Haifa University advances research

Since 1980, the institute has published al-Karmil, a journal devoted to Arab literature, in conjunction with the university's department of Arabic language and literature. And in cooperation with the Israel Oriental Society, the institute publishes Asian and African Studies three times a year.

The books released under the institute's imprimatur range far and wide in subject matter. Among the titles are Arab-Jewish Relations in Israel: A Quest in Human Understanding; Syria Under Assad: Domestic Constraints and Regional Risks; and Ottoman Palestine, 1800-1914: Studies in Social and Economic History.

Monographs have included Jews and Arabs in Eretz Israel During the Crusades; The Arab Countries and the Palestine War, 1945-1948; Iran and Inter-Arab Relations; Inter-Arab Relations and the Arab-Israeli Dispute; and The Politicization of the Syrian Army.

In line with its mandate, the institute also hosts conferences attended by guests from Israel and abroad.

Topics have dealt with Iraq, economic development in the territories, Jordan, conflict resolution in the Middle East and the impact of Russian immigration on the Israeli Arab community.

The Passing Parade

They died recently, leaving footprints in the sand...

Harold Zimman was a founder of the World Maccabiah Games and a director of the United States Olympic Committee. A football player at Tufts University, he was only the 28th American ever to receive the Olympic movement's highest accolade, the Olympic Order for meritorious service.

Ray Arcel was one of the greatest trainers in the pantheon of American boxing. An exacting and demanding man, he trained 22 champions, including three of the finest Jewish pugilists in history — Barney Ross, Benny Leonard and Phil Rosenberg. "The trainer," he liked to say, "is the boss ... the pillar of hope for every fighter."

Albert Blaustein, a Rutgers University law professor, was a renowned constitutional authority. He drafted the constitutions of Liberia and the Fiji islands, wrote part of the constitutions of Peru, Zimbabwe and Bangladesh, and served as a consultant in the drafting of the constitutions of Russia, Romania and Nicaragua.

Jerome Wiesner was President John F. Kennedy's scientific advisor, worked on the first U.S.-Soviet agreement to restrict nuclear proliferation and became the first Jewish president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Myron Malkin was the first director of the U.S. space shuttle program from 1973-1980. A physicist, Malkin left the National Aeronautics and Space Administration before the shuttle's first flight in 1981. But he was in the control room as a consultant during that historic event.

Ben Rich was a Lockheed Aircraft mechanical engineer who was instrumental in the development of two of the most advanced war planes in the U.S. Air Force — the SR-71 Blackbird and the F-117A. The Blackbird, which was unveiled in 1964, was a spy plane, while the F-117A, or Stealth, was a fighter-bomber virtually resistant to radar. It made its mark in the 1991 Gulf War.

Aharon Remez was the first commander of the Israeli Air Force. He was appointed to his position by David Ben-Gurion shortly after the outbreak of the 1948 War of Independence. He quit in 1951 in disagreement over the attempt to incorporate the air force into the overall armed forces. Later, he was a a member of the Knesset, minister of transportation and ambassador to Britain.

Pierre Dreyfus was president of one of Europe's biggest automobile makers, Renault of France, from 1955-1975. He transformed Renault into an industrial powerhouse. In 1981, he was minister of industry under President Francois Mitterrand.

Sol Shenk was a retailer who parlayed a single surplus goods shop in Ohio into the Consolidated Stores Corp. empire, with more than 700 stores.

Nathan Polowetzky was foreign editor and assistant general manager of the Associated Press from 1977-1990. As a foreign correspondent, he filed stories from all corners of the world.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI DANIEL EPSTEIN

This coming Shabbat, we read in the Torah of the completion of the Mishkan, the Tabernacle, and in the Haftorah, of the completion of the Beit HaMigdash, the Temple in Jerusalem. Let us compare these events.

The building of the Mishkan was an enterprise of the entire People of Israel. All were involved in donating the material, as well as in the actual construction. When we look at the description of the building of the Beit HaMigdash, we see a vastly different story. It was not the people who were described as the builders, but rather King Solomon. In fact we often refer to the First Temple as Solomon's Temple.

Let me suggest that we utilize the building of the Mishkan, not the building of the Beit HaMigdash, as a model for the Jewish community and its institutions. All too often, many of us find ourselves alienated and removed from the centres of power of the Jewish community, whether it be our own synagogue, a local agency or federation. True, a wealthy family may have donated substantial sums for a building, a group of active members may have invested huge amounts of time and energy in running an agency, or a skilled or learned person may have led this institution wisely. They ought to be respected and honored. But this need not disenfranchise the many others who devote their own time, creativity and resources to helping the cause, or those who would care to become involved.

Some scholars insist that the portable shrine built in the wilderness was more representative of the religion of ancient Israel and spoke to its needs and roots. It was far more democratic than the Beit HaMigdash, which centralized the monarchy and Judaism, but which also distanced many from the worship service, which became very bureaucratic and aristocratic.

I wonder if there was any opposition to the building of the Beit HaMigdash, with some asking, "Whose sanctuary is this, anyway?" Did some yearn for the decentralization of Judaism as it was developing? Did some feel excluded and alienated from the huge complex King Solomon was building?

Some suggest that in the last decades of the Second Temple, Judaism became democratized with the founding of the rabbinate. Now the religious leadership of the people was not a matter of lineage, that is, only coming from the traditional priesthood. If one was a serious student of Torah and could interpret and teach, one could lead the people in matters of faith and practice. After the destruction of the Beit HaMigdash this new institution — the rabbinate — was able to guide us.

Many yearn for the rebuilding of the Beit HaMigdash. Let us also find ways to empower all in their involvement in Jewish life and in their pursuit of Torah.

Thoughts for a New Moon

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

Rosh Chodesh II Adar is approaching, and with it the holiday of Purim, a story that revolves around two Jewish heroes: Mordecai and Esther.

Although both heroes are equally responsible for the happy outcome, are they both equally measured by tradition? Only through a close reading do we see that Mordecai and Esther truly stand side by side.

The Talmud tells us we must drink on Purim to the point of not distinguishing between "cursed is Haman and blessed is Mordecai." Clearly the rabbis are extending one of the themes of the text. Mordecai and Haman are often substituted one for the other: Mordecai saves the king's life, yet Haman is promoted.

The more subtle question is that while there are two heroes, why must we blur the lines with reference to only one. Why do rabbis not say: cursed is Haman and blessed are Mordecai and Esther. Has Esther been excluded from her status as a hero? The answer lies in the treatment of Esther's counterpart in the narrative, Vashti.

Vashti, the previous queen, appears only briefly. The reader is told that Vashti organized a celebration for the women which paralleled that for the men. The king summons Vashti to appear at his party in her royal crown. Vashti declines. We are given no reason in the text why she refuses, but the consequence of her refusal is her death.

At first the reader is appalled at such harsh treament of what may have been modesty on the part of Vashti. In fact, the midrash explains, the king wanted her to appear wearing only her royal crown.

The rabbis continue, saying Vashti herself would have agreed, but she was struck with leprosy (some say she grew a tail) and therefore could not appear.

This incident is being deliberately reread as a negative statement on her character. The Talmud is turning Vashti into a villain, an evil woman who deserved her fate. Yet surely Vashti is insignificant. She never reappears, having vanished half way through the first chapter. The reader is left wondering why the rabbis have gone to such lengths. The answer lies with Mordecai and Esther.

While Mordecai is balanced by Haman, Esther has no parallel balance. The text often shows Mordecai and Haman as the reversal of one another. Yet we have ignored the parallels between Esther and Vashti: Esther is afraid of being killed for appearing before the king without summons while Vashti ignores his summons; Vashti gives a party for the women, and Esther gives a party for the king and Haman.

The text has shown Esther and Vashti to function as do Haman and Mordecai. The rabbis of the midrash complete this comparison by recreating Vashti in the image of Haman. His lineage is drawn back to evil ancestors, as is Vashti's.

We are told to drink until we cannot distinguish between "cursed is Haman and blessed is Mordecai." The Talmud has allowed us by implication "cursed is Vashti and blessed is Esther."

Ohr Somayach fetes newly observant

THORNHILL — They came from different backgrounds and experiences, but all followed the difficult path to religious observance. Their struggles and achievements were recognized at Links in the Chain, a recent Ohr Somayach celebration.

Five couples who not only became observant but also went on to work for the community, were honored at the event, held at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Brian and Jeannine Callan, Jeremy and Judi Cohen, Arthur and Evelyn Jacobs, Drs. Bob and Esther Libman and Gerry and Line Rubinstein have all been active in Ohr Somayach, taking classes, attending services, soaking up the atmosphere.

In turn, they have become a part of the organization, leading classes and services, tutoring and, says an Ohr Somayach press release, "opening their homes and lives to Jews of all types."

Rabbi Avram Rothman, executive director of the Thornhill branch of Ohr Somayach, called the couples "the backbone of Ohr Somayach. They have and are making a difference."

Guest speaker Rabbi Moshe Weinberger of Congregation Aish Kodesh in New York told the audience of over 300 that the essence of Yiddishkeit is chesed, acts of kindness and caring.

Aside from Torah and mitzvot, Rabbi Weinberger said that what a person will remember most over the years will be the chesed shown to him or her by other Jews.

A d'var Torah was given by Rabbi Baruch Taub of Beth Avraham Yoseph. Bram Zinman chaired the evening, which was followed by a dessert reception.

Beit Lid shows that dream of peace really a nightmare

By DR. MICHAEL WILSCHANSKI

The Beit Lid massacre has been a watershed event in Israel.

The reason is clear. This tragedy has finally revealed Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' dream of a new Middle East to be a nightmare.

Gone is the talk of open borders, cooperation and prosperity as outlined in his recent book. The catch phrases are now "electronic fences" and "separation."

GUEST VOICES

This is not the peace for which we hoped. It is not surprising that even according to the prime minister's office, only 30 per cent or less of the population supports the continued negotiations, that a recent opinion poll has Benjamin Netanyahu 22 per cent ahead and that even President Ezer Weizman has called for a halt to reassess if PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat is really the person with whom to do business.

I am one of those 150,000 citizens of Israel who live in the territories. I live in Elazar, a village of 70 families in Gush Etzion, a group of communities situated between Bethlehem and Hebron.

The history of this region is the history of the birth of the State of Israel. The original Yom Hazikaron (Memorial Day) occurred on the fourth of Iyar 5708, when the Gush Etzion massacre took place and the Gush communities fell. I have neighbors and friends who recite Kaddish on Yom Hazikaron for their fathers. Somehow David Ben-Gurion found the strength the next day to announce the establishment of our state. The importance of Yom Ha'atzmaut is the beginning of Jewish sovereignty over our land on the road to redemption.

Gush Etzion

Following the War of Independence we lived in a very small area under constant threat. On Yom Ha'atzmaut 1967, while the rest of his yeshivah was rejoicing, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook, the head of Yeshivat Merkaz Harav, was in tears. When asked to explain, he said: "How can I be happy when we have not yet returned to the Old City of Jerusalem, Hebron and Shchem?" The Six Day War occurred two weeks later.

It is impossible for me to relate the feelings of those neighbors who, although they say Kaddish on Yom Hazikaron, rejoice in the fact that they have returned to rebuild their fathers' dream. This is the beauty of living in Gush Etzion.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was elected in 1992 on a security ticket. Who can forget his pre-election speeches concerning the Golan? "Whoever withdraw from the Golan endangers the security of The State of Israel." In the Labor party manifesto there is a promise that the terrorist PLO is not a negotiating partner. Little did we know what would ensue. The "handshake" with Arafat was the end of political Zionism.

Twenty-seven of the 33 clauses of the PLO covenant deal with the destruction of the State of Israel. Indeed, Jews are labelled in this document with every imaginable obscenity from colonialists to Nazis. The very fact that the covenant was not entirely overhauled before the handshake, or indeed in the following 18 months, means that the prime minister has recognized the "inalienable rights of the Palestinian people" and hence negated Zionism. It is not surprising that the religious anti-Zionist Neturei Karta embrace the person whom Rabin has shaken hands with — the Neturei Karta and the Government of Israel are on the same side!

There are those who perpetrate the myth that there really is a difference between the "moderate" PLO and the "extremist" Hamas and Islamic Jihad, and we should fight the extremists and support the moderates. This is just another attempt to hoodwink the public. Is Arafat not a "fundamentalist" when he incessantly mentions jihad, when he fails to condemn the murder of innocents and orders the systematic assassination of Arabs who have helped us in the past?

Had Arafat played his cards well and at least stopped terrorism by his own followers, the Israeli people may have believed that something has indeed changed. This is what we were waiting for. Indeed Peres proclaimed last year that we will have "100 years of peace." Instead, we have had well over 100 funerals, at least 16 of them caused by Fatah (using data from the non-partisan Peace Watch).

Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin tried to circumvent this uncomfortable fact during a recent visit to Toronto. It is not difficult to see why he "overlooked" this point. The government is so obsessed with this Declaration of Principles that it has turned it into a pseudo-religion, a cult, to be followed blindly under all circumstances. Thus it is not surprising that small facts like the murder of Chaim Mizrachi by a PLO policeman-in-training are conveniently forgotten.

It is possible for Israel to achieve a durable peace with our neighbors. This must be based on security, justice and truth. The problem is not territorial but existential. Do the Arabs really accept the existence of a viable Jewish state and not just sign agreements to force Israel into a position where her destruction is but 11 km away?

Defensible borders

For the Arab who resides west of the Jordan River and who wants nationalism at any cost, there is always the option to move to the east side of the Jordan, which is 76 per cent of Mandatory Palestine. If democracy were allowed to function there, a Palestinian Arab would surely be leader.

However, I believe Jews and Arabs can live together in the Land of Israel. I am not in favor of "ethnic cleansing" or "transfer" of anyone. The Arabs west of the Jordan should have some sort of control over their own lives and day-to-day activities, subject to negotiations, but security and the land itself are ours, and ours only.

Like every other Israeli, I long for peace and would not like any sons to serve in the army. However, I have one greater wish and that is to live in our homeland with defensible borders. If the price for this is army and reserve duty — so be it.

There are people who claim that to save the whole body, sometimes a limb has to be sacrificed, and thus justify the relinquishing of Judea and Samaria. This is the heartland of our country and, as a doctor, I state that if the limb to be amputated is the heart, there is no body left to save.

Dr. Michael Wilschanski is a pediatrician in Jerusalem and Gush Etzion and is currently a research fellow at the University of Toronto.

Diversity called cornerstone for Canadian unity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada's unity was built on diversity, which raises practical issues and practical opportunities, said the federal minister of multiculturalism last week.

Sheila Finestone was the keynote speaker at a forum here titled Unity in Diversity: a New Multicultural Policy for Canada?

"In the decades ahead, global migration will continue to make Canada and Canadians an even more diversified society," Finestone told the audience of 300. "Pluralism is a fact of life in Canada and in most places in the world — this will require us to adapt and to adjust."

The minister identified 10 practical reasons for supporting multiculturalism, including international political interests and economic self-interest. But "not everyone agrees that diversity is so great," she said.

Moderator Fil Fraser, a former chief commissioner at the Alberta Human Rights Commission and the new president of Vision TV, said Canada must deal with new realities.

The four panelists reflected diverse opinions on multiculturalism. Bronwyn Drainie, author and Globe and Mail columnist, said her views on multiculturalism are constantly changing. She believes the primary goal of a Canadian policy should be choice — the choice between aggressive individualism which disregards where you came from or your cultural background, and those who wish to stay in their own community and retain their language and culture.

Drainie said federal multiculturalism got its "bad name" by funding folk dancing, crafts groups and multicultural councils.

Writer and broadcaster Eve Drobot, noting both her Jewish background and Catholic family ties, condemned multiculturalism as "tribalism" which "includes anyone like yourself and excludes anyone else." There is no way to be opposed to the policy of multiculturalism, she said, without finding yourself with some very strange bedfellows who you would not want to invite to your home.

Drobot believes the 1971 government proclamation on multiculturalism emphasizes our differences. "That to me is racism. We've fragmented and torn into tiny bits whatever there was of Canadianism."

Banker Hugh Graham, originally from Barbados, stressed equality of status of culture and of opportunity. "There is a need for government and the people to look at the hard issues of economic and social equality and not the soft issues of cultural and linguistic diversity."

He suggested the Ministry of Multiculturalism be combined with the Ministry of Citizenship and the Human Rights Commission.

Wegdan Azzam, president of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Council of Muslim Women, spoke of a pluralistic society where "groups have the right to develop their own identity, their own lifestyle, as well as preserve their own cultural heritage," adding that "ethnic diversity is not incompatible with national unity."

Racism, she says, is alive and well in Toronto and Canada and with Canadian representatives in government as well as non-governmental institutions. She said Muslims are constantly "targeted in a limited manner" by Canadian and international media.

In a lively and sometimes heated discussion, audience members told of past racist experiences and the inequality they felt existed, particularly in Canadian employment practices.

Tension rose when a man in the audience, who introduced himself as an Anglo-Saxon, accused a small number of Third World immigrants of being responsible for half the violent crimes in Scarborough, where he lives. "We are not going to tolerate that kind of cancer in our midst," he said, calling multiculturalism a "degradation of schools, society and our country.

"We will destroy you first," he shouted. "Multiculturalism is Third World garbage."

The public affairs forum was co-presented by the St. Lawrence Centre Forum and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, with the cooperation of the University of Toronto.

Outreach program aimed at ending prejudice

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — A kit that will take Jewish traditions into classrooms throughout Atlantic Canada was unveiled Feb. 20.

The launch of the Jewish educational outreach program will "enable us, through understanding, to work towards elimination of prejudice and ignorance," Marcia Koven told more than 80 New Brunswick educators and government officials.

In a Heritage Day ceremony at Shaarei Zedek Synagogue in Saint John, N.B., Koven, director of the Jewish Historical Society of Saint John, unveiled the manual and materials to be used.

The materials, in both English and French, include workbooks, video and audio tapes, recipes, activities and a variety of items to show elementary and junior high school children what Judaism is all about. There are kits for the major holidays and Shabbat, and a special kit on Jewish life cycles, describing Jewish life from birth to grave.

The Shabbat kit contains a tablecloth, two real challahs (varnished for preservation), a Kiddush cup, music tapes, videos, games and activities and recipes. "A teacher can actually bake challah in her classroom," said Koven.

The Chanukah kit contains dreidels, a menorah, candles and cookie cutters, as well as working materials and audio/video cassettes. There are also kits for Passover, Shavuot, and the High Holy Days.

The program was funded through the Saint John Foundation, Samuel and Saidye Bronfman Foundation, Department of the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship, Canada/New Brunswick Cooperation Agreement on Cultural Development, Tammy Fallon Memorial Fund, friends and family of Mrs. Rose Freedman, and friends and family of Jen and Lou Michaelson. Koven said the support from New Brunswick's Department of Education was outstanding.

Kits will be lent to schools on a two-week basis, said Koven, sent out and returned at the Museum's expense "until the money runs out." But she hopes the response to the program will generate more funding and creation of additional kits.

Ann Baker, education coordinator for New Brunswick museums, said no one would be intimidated by the material. "It is well done, the writing clear and concise. When we had the Coat of Many Colors display at the Saint John Museum, not being Jewish, I had to do a lot of homework to understand what it was all about. If I had something like these kits, it would have been much easier for me."

Kit is easy to read

"The kit is hands-on and has wonderful artifacts, which are so useful compared to pointing at pictures in a book," said Cathy LeBouthillier, school supervisor for the French district schools of Saint John. "It is colorful, easy to read and geared to people who know little about the Jewish culture."

Koven said the historical society's museum is visited by hundreds of Saint John youngsters every year, "but what about the rest of the province? They may never meet a Jewish person and have preconceived ideas about Jews. With this program, we can show how beautiful our religion is and how all religions can identify with each other."

She said the kit and manual were produced with the help of Carl and Ruth Wolpin, both Saint John-area public school teachers. A professional translator converted the kit to French.

Peace process dead: Israeli journalist

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have been dead for over a year, though neither side is willing to admit it, according to David Dolan.

A freelance reporter who has been living in East Jerusalem for the past 15 years, Dolan said the current wave of terrorism is the worst he has seen in Israel.

Dolan, a Christian, said he fervently believes the future of the country is grim and "in G-d's hands. We saw miracles during the Gulf War when missiles rained on Israel and just barely missed crucial targets. If we believe in G-d, maybe He can save the Jews again."

The Labor government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is dead, Dolan told a Hadassah meeting at the Jewish Community Centre. While Rabin is sincere in his peace efforts, he had no concept of the depth of feeling that exists for Judea and Samaria until he was convinced by the two Chief Rabbis and former president Chaim Herzog.

Any further moves to give Judea and Samaria to the Palestinians could result in civil strife. Already, he noted, there have been fights between Peace Now followers and the Orthodox after acts of terrorism by the Hamas. He said the status quo would be the best possible scenario for Israel.

Dolan said Rabin's recent suggestion of separating the Israelis and Arabs is impractical because 800,000 Arabs who live in Israel say they are Palestinians, while another 200,000 are beyond the Green Line and in East Jerusalem.

Hamas terrorism will increase in intensity, Dolan predicted. Even Palestinian women are being trained for suicide bombings.

Other Arab countries are backing away from deals with Israel. Talks with Syria are on hold because of pressure from Iran. Iran is also influencing Egypt through terrorism and Egypt is trying to improve its position with Iran by coordinating efforts to have Israel sign a nuclear non-proliferation treaty — an act Israel has consistently resisted.

The Gulf states are withdrawing support for the concept of a Middle East bank. Iraq, controlled by "a certified madman," continues to develop dangerous weapons, despite a worldwide embargo against the country.

In a possible war between Syria and Israel, the Hezbollah would step up attacks in Lebanon.

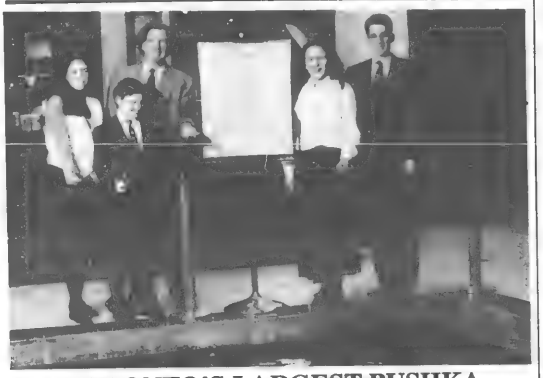
Dolan said the whole problem centres on the fact that a Jewish state in the Middle East "is a contradiction to the Muslim fundamentalist faith." He is researching a book on Hamas and said the Koran calls for the Muslim religion to be "supreme." There is no room for compromise.

Ninety-six per cent of the Muslims Arafat claims to lead are supporters of the Hamas. Mohammed calls for followers to make peace with the "infidels" and then wipe them out.

There is no reference in the Koran to Jerusalem, Dolan said, but Hamas wants the city, in order to establish their supremacy and to control the easiest road to the Islamic holy city of Mecca.

Arafat is too weak to crack down on Hamas. If he tries, he will be killed and a powerful fundamentalist group will take over, Dolan said.

He said Islamic fundamentalists have links with neo-Nazis in the United States. A native of northern Idaho, a headquarters for neo-Nazis, Dolan said he left for Israel after watching young people in Nazi uniforms parading and giving the Hitler salute.



TORONTO'S LARGEST PUSHKA

UJA project aimed at identifying Jews from South Africa

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal (UJA) has undertaken an ambitious project to identify Jews from South Africa living in Toronto.

According to a recent McGill University study carried out in conjunction with, among others, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, South Africans represent 13.5 per cent of all Jewish immigrants who have arrived in Toronto since 1971.

About 3,600 Jews emigrated from South Africa to Toronto in the last 20 years, but UJA had only a few hundred listed in its records.

Campaign associate Ronit Climan formed a committee of volunteers formerly from South Africa who will help find the others. The enlistment campaign is paying off. Already, hundreds of additional names have been added to UJA's rolls.

"By the time we are done, we should have a couple of thousand," said Antony Karabus who, with Alan Berkeley, is co-chairing the identification drive.

"It's a slow building process," Karabus said, but one that is "well worthwhile" because the Jewish community in South Africa boasts what he calls "a phenomenal history of giving."

"Recently in Capetown, 20,000 Jews raised seven million rand (approximately $2.8 million)," he said.

In Toronto, Karabus said the UJA's goal is not to "ghettoize South Africans," but to integrate them, because "they have been under-represented in the UJA campaign." The objective of the identification project is to get newly discovered South African expatriates involved, not to solicit funds from them.

Joining Karabus and Berkeley on the committee are Lorraine and Alan Sandler, David Berman, Lawrie Apple and Brian Simon.

The UJA Women's Campaign, which raised $4 million for 1995, is looking north for new recruits.

Based on the McGill University analysis, some 44,000 Jews, or nearly 27 per cent of the Jewish population in the Greater Toronto Area, live in York Region, north of Steeles.

UJA Women's Campaign chair Marlene Axmith sees York as an excellent location for outreach.

"We have a lot of inroads to make in that area," she said.

CHERNOBYL CHILDREN PLAY BALL

Twenty Jewish children who were victims of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster receive baseball tips from California Angels' outfield coach Sam Suplizio (kneeling centre) and Oakland A's hitting coach Jim Lefebvre (left) who were in Israel for a baseball clinic. The boys are among 1,089 children brought to Israel for treatment by Chabad's Children of Chernobyl program.

Canadian Jewish Congress
National 24th Plenary Assembly

Bonaventure Hilton Hotel, Montreal
May 14-15, 1995

Notice To The Community

The Ontario Region of the Canadian Jewish Congress is entitled to elect 490 delegates-at-large to the forthcoming National Plenary Assembly, as follows: Toronto 370, Hamilton 30, Windsor 30, London 30, and outlying communities 30.

Any member of the Jewish community in Ontario may nominate up to three delegates, including himself/herself. Delegates to the Plenary Assembly automatically become members of both the National and Regional councils, and are entitled to vote for National CJC's elected positions as well as the Regional officers and executive.

Every Jew 18 years of age or over, residing in the Ontario Region who supports the Aims and Objectives of Canadian Jewish Congress, is deemed to be a member of the Ontario Region.

Delegates to the Plenary must qualify for election in accordance with the Ontario Region Rules and Regulations, which stipulate that, "no person shall be eligible for election or appointment to office and throughout his or her term of office, unless such person be a contributor in good standing with his or her local United Jewish Appeal or United Israel Appeal campaign, where applicable. The determination of eligibility shall be in accordance with Article 43 of By-law 66."

All nominations, which must be in writing, include the nominee's address, telephone and fax (if available), and contain the signed acceptance of the nomination by the nominee, are to be forwarded to the Regional Nominations Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, ATTENTION: Manuel Prutschi, Executive Director, and are to be received no later than March 15, 1995.

Please note that, if the total number of delegates nominated by members together with the slate of delegates proposed by the Nominations Committee exceed 490, then an election for delegates by the members of the Ontario Region shall be held prior to April 13, 1995.

Camp Robin Hood to celebrate 50th birthday

Where are they now? Counsellors serve lunch to campers at a cookout at Camp Robin Hood in this picture from the late-1970s.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Camp Robin Hood, the oldest private day camp in Canada, will be celebrating its 50th birthday this summer.

To mark this milestone the camp is holding a reunion day for former staff on August 13.

Over 1,000 people have been contacted and the reunion steering committee is still trying to find another 900 former staff members, owner-director Larry Bell told The CJN.

Those attending will be able to spend an entire day at camp, beginning with — what else for a dose of nostalgia? — a bus ride up to camp, Bell said.

Camp Robin Hood, located on a 50-acre farm north east of Markham since 1964, had modest beginnings. The original camp-site was at Sherwood Park (hence the name Robin Hood) in the Mount Pleasant Avenue area. The 20 campers that first year went swimming at a local secondary school.

Enrolment has increased considerably since then. The camp can now accommodate 1,000 campers at a time, 850 in the regular camp program and 150 at the MPV Baseball Academy; and 280 staff members are on site at all times.

Robin Hood has four swimming pools, a small petting zoo and a man-made pond stocked with trout for fishing. It is among the few day camps with canoeing, Bell said.

Other activities offered include field sports, archery, cooperative games, a low ropes course, nature lore, music and drama, arts and crafts, computers, and gymnastics.

Two compulsory swim instruction periods a day reflect a strong emphasis on swimming. Parents view swimming as a survival skill, Bell said.

The baseball academy, inaugurated seven years ago as a result of the popularity of the Blue Jays, is a specialized skills-development program which operates independently of the day camp.

Although Camp Robin Hood attracts predominantly Jewish campers it is a non-denominational camp. Bell said he has tried to preserve the non-denominational character of the camp because he believes the exposure to people of different backgrounds makes camp more interesting.

Bell was first hired to run the waterfront program in 1961 when he was a physical education student and serious competitive swimmer. In 1964 he was offered a partnership in the camp and has been the sole owner since 1971.

Now in his 35th year with Camp Robin Hood, Bell has seen the enrolment increase from 250 campers in 1961 to 1,000 in 1988. Despite this growth and the wide scope of activities, the goal of camp has remained constant he said. "Our business is providing a worthwhile experience for children."

Israel Challenge program

NEW JERSEY — When Jewish communities everywhere are struggling to hold the allegiance of their youth, the YM-YWHA of Bergen County, N.J., has devised a summer program called the Israel Challenge.

It has been designed to appeal to young people who are varsity-level athletes or serious outdoorsmen.

There are two separate programs to choose from: the Israeli Sports Challenge, called the most innovative sports program in Israel in the last 10 years, and the Wilderness Challenge, which features a week-long sojourn in Sinai.

Each group of teenagers (15 to 17) will spend five weeks (June 25 to July 31) in Israel.

Boys and girls will be accompanied by highly rated Jewish coaches in basketball, tennis, swimming, volleyball, and soccer.

For more information, contact Herb Levine, Israel Challenge director at the YM-YWHA of Bergen County, 605 Pascack Road, Washington Township, NJ 07675.

The program is sponsored in part by the CRB Foundation, and endorsed by the JCC Association, and by Maccabi USA-Sports for Israel.

Professor to study UN's human rights record

practices affecting the human rights of the population in the territitories has produced 75 reports. "Israel is the only country whose specific human rights situation is under investigation by a UN committee not comprised of independent representatives. Of the three states on the committee, only one has diplomatic relations with Israel."

• The committee on the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, established in 1975 on the same day as the infamous Zionism is Racism resolution, has issued 18 vitriolic reports concerning Israel.

• A special human rights investigator assigned to study Israel is the only one whose mandate is open-ended — the 15 others are reconstituted on a yearly basis.

"There is no doubt that in terms of focus on individual states, Israel is a major preoccupation of the human rights machinery."

This disproportionate emphasis, she said, can't be isolated from UN handling of anti-Semitism.

A resolution on racism, zenophobia and religious intolerance included anti-Semitism for the first time last year — and that was with considerable opposition.

As well, two efforts to include it in the declaration issued by the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna were rebuffed, with the conference chair noting privately, Bayefsky said, that anti-Semitism is a "very controversial subject."

"Fifty years after the Holocaust, in a worldwide human rights meeting whose purpose was to reaffirm the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, anti-Semitism couldn't be mentioned."

These phenonema, she pointed out, have been almost totally unaffected by the peace process, as viciously anti-Israel resolutions continue to pour out of United Nations bodies.

Bayefsky's concerns in the study are not solely about Israel.

For two-thirds of the states that ratify UN human rights treaties, "ratification has become an end in itself — a means to receive easy accolades for empty gestures," she said.

Over 50 per cent fail to produce required reports on their treaty compliance, and reports that are produced "often consist of unmitigated lies."

Libya, for instance, she said, reported that it was a free and democratic society dedicated to a concern for human rights.

Committees that receive and examine the reports, have no powers of investigation or visitation.

As well, a large number of states that ratify human rights treaties qualify their ratification. Islamic states, for instance, when they do ratify these treaties (some, like Saudi Arabia, ignore them altogether, she said), usually insist that any obligations called for must be compatible with Islamic law.

"Such reservations negate the central purpose of overriding universal human rights standards," she believes.

Many ratifying states either fail to accept mechanisms that allow individuals to complain of treaty violations, or, when they do permit complaint, find a way to prevent individuals from coming forward.

Bayefsky's credentials for this study are impressive.

Educated at the University of Toronto and Oxford University, and a member of the Ontario bar, she has been a professor of international and constitutional law and human rights at the University of Ottawa since 1981.

She is the 1992 winner of the prestigious Bora Laskin National Fellowship in Human Rights Research, and of the Columbia University Centre for the Study of Human Rights Fellowship in 1984.

She has written extensively on human rights and constitutional law issues, and has been on the editorial board of a number of important Canadian legal journals.

She has served with various Canadian delegations to the UN, and is on the board of many international human rights organizations.

In making the award, the MacArthur Foundation said it had confidence "that your project can make a positive difference in facing the numerous challenges to peace, security and human dignity in the contemporary world."

Maritimers welcome Hebrew U rep

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — The executive director of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University had not been in Halifax for more than eight years.

But Yoel Nesson, midway through his three-year term in that post, found an enthusiastic group of former Hebrew University students and interested citizens in the Nova Scotia capital ready to hear about the school.

"My purpose was to re-establish ties and let people know Hebrew University is alive and well," said Nesson in an interview.

In addition, Michael Litvack, academic affairs coordinator in Canada for the university, visited Dalhousie, Acadia and Mount Allison universities during the four-day whirlwind tour through the Maritimes, talking to current students about spending a year at the Rothberg School for Overseas Students and to faculty about the curriculum at Hebrew University and the credits Canadian students can earn there.

"Our reputation is such that the invitation to come to Mount Allison came from Carla Neubould, wife of the president [Dr. Ian Neubould]. Both visited there last summer, as part of a Canadian Jewish Congress tour with other Canadian university presidents," said Nesson.

He said Hebrew University is very involved in the Mideast peace process.

One of the mandates of Hebrew University, said Nesson, is to promote Jewish culture. "Israel is concerned with its own continuity. Some Israelis think speaking Hebrew and celebrating the holidays is all the continuity they need. But there is more, much more, and Israelis struggle to deal with it.

The First Baptist Church before it was converted to the Orthodox Beach Hebrew Institute synagogue in 1920 and as it is now (inset).

Beach Shul marks 75 years

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In 1920 the First Baptist Church in Toronto's Eastern Beaches community was converted to the Orthodox Beach Hebrew Institute synagogue.

This summer, the 75th anniversary of the Beach Shul, as it is less formally known, will be marked during a weekend of memorable events from June 23 through June 25 at 109 Kenilworth Ave. just south of Queen Street East.

Though records of the synagogue's early years are virtually nonexistent, marble plaques in the entrance and sanctuary bear the names of those believed to have founded the congregation: J. Birnbaum, S. Cohen, S. Friedman, Manuel and Rose Gebertig, M. Goldberg, S. Gurofsky, J. Herzlich, G. Levy, J. Marin, Hyman and Sarah Mehr, A. Pritzker, Louis and Elizabeth Schwartz, J. Shalof, Hillel and Edith Wineberg and Maurice and Tilley Wolfe.

Some 40 families joined, mainly those with businesses and homes in the predominately non-Jewish area. Summer cottagers also attended.

The building was originally on Queen Street East. After the 1920 sale by the First Baptist Church, the small brick-and-timber structure was raised from its foundations and moved several hundred feet south. It was also rotated to face east. The Baptist congregation moved to larger quarters.

In 1924, architect J. Hunt added a more spacious entrance with a circular window and Star of David. He also added kitchen facilities on the main floor and a balcony for the women.

At the outset the Beach Shul was an oasis in a kind of desert not always hospitable towards Jews. The shul's name, Beach Hebrew Institute, deliberately did not include the word synagogue. But over the years, the congregation has enjoyed good relations with its neighbors.

In 1991, the Beach shul introduced Chanukah candlelighting to augment the traditional Christmas tree lighting at the local branch of the Toronto Public Library. The annual tradition brings Christian and Jew together with warmth and mutual respect.

There has never been a rabbi at the Beach shul. Queen Street business owner Sam Tanenbaum currently leads High Holiday and weekly services with shul president Ari Nerman.

The congregation has changed a lot in 75 years. In the early 1940s attendance dropped as storekeepers moved their living quarters north. New life was given when intellectuals and hippies discovered "The Beach" in the 1950s and 1960s, but after another exodus, only a few elders and transients remained.

Then young Jewish professionals, business people and singles joined. Together with children of early members, they raised funds, repaired and renovated the building, instituted a Sunday School and began an annual seder.

Today the Beach Hebrew Institute has a membership of 130 households, operates in the black and looks ahead. The congregation welcomes the observant, the lapsed, the individual in a suit or the student in jeans. And no one is ever turned away on Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur because he or she has no ticket.

Nerman would like those with photos, momentos or anything to contribute to the June celebrations to contact him at 416-469-3930.

Israel accused of obstructing peace process

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

CAIRO — The Palestinians have launched a campaign to convince the world that Israel is obstructing the peace process, and that the price for not intervening could be its total collapse.

A recent statement read by Palestinian Authority Information Minister Yasser Abed-Rabbo after a meeting of nine members of the PLO executive committee, said it "decided to launch a political and diplomatic campaign" worldwide, and especially in the Middle East.

The campaign began with a meeting between PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, followed by another with Foreign Minister Amr Moussa. Arafat then flew to Saudi Arabia to meet with King Fahd.

Abed-Rabbo said the campaign will include the United States, Russia, the European Union and other states.

"The peace process has begun to lose credibility and continuation is not possible now, as long as the Israeli government is engaged in a policy of postponing the application of agreements. Any cessation of the peace process will lead to its collapse as a whole," Abed-Rabbo said.

He cited Israeli settlement activity and the closures of the territories as contributing factors to "the destruction of this historical opportunity."

Only nine members of the 18-member executive committee attended the meeting at Arafat's villa on the outskirts of Cairo.

A second meeting will be held in early March in Tunis, "to re-evaluate the situation again," Abed-Rabbo said.

Saeb Erekat, head of a delegation on election talks, said the Tunis meeting would include PLO Political Department chief Farouk Kaddoumi, Oslo accord negotiator Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), and others who boycotted the two-day Cairo meeting.

Erekat said no progress was made in the election talks. "There is no agreement whatsoever," except for an agreement on separate elections for the council and its chief executive, he said.

Yoel Singer, the head of the Israeli team, departed from his usual optimism. He said the negotiations would resume in Cairo shortly and he hoped to meet Erekat before that without the other negotiators.

Mohammed Shtayyeh, a member of the Palestinian team, said the good spirits of the previous day had changed for the worse.

"Israel's main problem is that they think of themselves as partners, and we consider them facilitators," he said.

He added that it should be no concern of Israel's what arrangements Palestinians choose to make concerning international observers, election supervision, or voting age. "Whether voters are 17 or 1 has no bearing on their security interests," he said.

Jaweed Ghussein, chair of the Palestine National Fund and an executive committee member, said talks might be better suspended, at least until the executive committee meets in Tunis.

"We feel that negotiating now is not going to be fruitful," he said. But no decision was taken to suspend talks.

It was decided, however, that Arafat would head a higher committee appointed by the executive committee, which would include executive committee members and PA ministers, "to start a Palestinian national dialogue." This would be aimed at bridging the widening gaps between those who want to continue talks and those who want to end them.

South Africa launches ties with 'State of Palestine'

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — South Africa is establishing full diplomatic relations with the "State of Palestine" — a move that elicited protest from the Israeli government.

South African Foreign Minister Alfred Nzo made the announcement in Cape Town last month, at a joint news conference with Farouk Kaddoumi, the head of the Palestine Liberation Organization's Tunis-based political department.

The Israeli government, in accordance with the Declaration of Principles signed with the PLO in September 1993, considers the issue of a Palestinian state a matter to be determined in the context of future negotiations with the PLO.

Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin criticized the move, saying, "It's a decision that doesn't help the peace process, and we're very sorry about that."

The Israeli government has already lodged an official protest, in a meeting between Nzo and Elazar Granot, Israel's ambassador to South Africa, according to a spokesman for the Israeli Mission to the United Nations in New York.

"This is an unacceptable situation from our point of view," the spokesman said. "I don't know of any country in the world that has established diplomatic relations with the State of Palestine. That's because it doesn't exist."

During the Cape Town news conference, Nzo said that his government was taking the step in the context of the country's effort to become "a full member of the international community," in the wake of the victory of President Nelson Mandela in the country's first all-race elections last April.

Nzo said his country was acting "in concert" with other African nations and the countries of the Non-Aligned Movement, adding that "the vast majority of these states and organizations recognize the State of Palestine."

He said South Africa "as a matter of principle, recognizes states and maintains normal diplomatic relations with them, regardless of their ideologies."

Establishing relations with the Palestinians, he added, "brings us on the same level as our relations with Israel, Jordan, Syria, Egypt" and other countries.

Nzo said the step was taken as part of his government's commitment to the ongoing Middle East peace process.

"I would like to emphasize that the formalization of our relationship with Palestine does not in any way affect our relationship with Israel or our support for their right to live within secure borders," he said.

Iranians suspected of holding flyer Arad

Wuda Olef Skota told the paper he was never given the Israeli's name, nor information about his condition. The paper went on to claim that German-mediated negotiations between Israel and Iran on the release of Arad had been held in Germany.

Meanwhile, another German citizen, Helmut Shimkos, who was imprisoned in the same prison, revealed more details Sunday about the whereabouts of Arad. Shimkos, an engineer, was jailed on suspicion of spying for the CIA.

"In 1991, I was sitting with two Americans, one of whom was a pilot who had some flight magazines. The warder then asked us if we had some magazines to give to another pilot in the prison," Shimkos told Israeli television's Channel 1.

"That made us suspicious; so we asked around to find out who this could be. But we didn't find out anything and we didn't imagine then that it could be Ron Arad."

An official Israeli government statement said the possibility that Arad is being held in an Iranian jail "can be neither refuted nor corroborated, since there are no signs of life given in the testimonies by people who claim to know."

Arad's wife Tami said she would not have anything to say until her husband returns, Channel 1 reported.

The Prime Minister's Office, meanwhile, denied that a visit by an aide to Chancellor Helmut Kohl has any connection to Arad.

While dismissing the latest reports on Arad's whereabouts, Rabin promised Israeli officials would continue to pursue any relevant information.

"Whenever there is new intelligence, we will do everything we can," he said.

Rabin has appointed a new head to the team of security and military officials who handle ongoing attempts to recover missing and captured servicemen.

The move came after a commission appointed by the prime minister a year ago recommended that the staff be changed.

The commission examined how security and military officials have dealt with information on the fates of missing and captured Israeli servicemen. It also investigated the contacts that were subsequently made, and focused in particular on the actions of the head of the negotiating team, Uri Lubrani.

As a result of the committee's recommendations, Rabin appointed Yossi Genossar, a former senior official in the General Security Service, to head the staff.

Austria launches fund for reparations

Vranitzky's decision to set up a fund for victims of Nazi brutality is closely connected with his belief that Austria is obliged to accept responsibility for its involvement in Nazi atrocities.

In 1990, four years after becoming chancellor, Vranitzky's government signed an accord with the U.S.-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims on Austria, under which the Austrian government agreed to disburse about $30 million (US) worth of funds to Jewish institutions inside and outside Austria.

A year later, Vranitzky, who is also chair of the Social Democratic party of Austria, issued an unprecedented, formal apology for Austria's role during the Nazi period.

In June 1993, when he was the first Austrian chancellor to visit Israel, he acknowledged that Austria shared "a moral responsibility" for crimes committed against Jews.

In an interview at the Four Seasons Hotel on the last leg of his official visit to Canada, during which he met Prime Minister Jean Chretien in Ottawa, Vranitzky said he intends to deliver a special message to Austrian parliamentarians on the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

He will urge the younger generation to reject right-wing extremism, anti-Semitism and racism, so as "to avoid a repetition of what we saw in the 1920s and 1930s."

And he will discuss Austria's Nazi past, analyse the events which led to World War II and talk of "the conclusions we have to draw from this."

On May 7, Vranitzky and members of the cabinet will officially mark the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Mauthausen concentration camp.

Asked whether neo-Nazism poses a threat to Austrian democracy, Vranitzky said it is "far from being a mass problem."

However, he noted, "we have to be vigilant."

Military prosecutor appeals terrorist's death sentence

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An Israeli military prosecutor has asked a military appeals court to overturn the death sentence of a Palestinian, who was convicted of plotting a fatal bus bombing in April.

The prosecutor, Moshe Bachar, told a five-judge appeals panel in the West Bank town of Ramallah last week, that a lower court had overstepped its authority in November when it ordered the execution of Said Badarneh, 24, of the West Bank village of Yabad.

Badarneh had been found guilty of planning and assisting in the suicide bombing of a bus in the central Israeli town of Hadera. The bombing killed five Israelis and wounded dozens of others.

The terrorist had claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of Hamas, a fundamentalist group.

Bachar said the Jenin military court had ignored his recommendation for a life sentence and asked the appeals court to hand down six life sentences instead.

A ruling on the appeal was set for a later date, but the death sentence was expected to be reversed.

All previous military death sentences have been overturned and commuted to life in prison. The only time Israel has employed the death penalty was in 1962, with the execution of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann.

Meanwhile, Badarneh expressed no remorse for what he had done. He indicated there would be reprisals from Hamas militants if he were executed. He also said he was not afraid of having his appeal rejected.

"We are blowing ourselves up in buses," he said. "Do you think I am afraid of the death penalty?"

Peres in Cairo over nukes

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres visited Cairo last week in an effort to ease tensions over Egypt's repeated demand that Israel sign the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty when it comes up for renewal in April.

Although the two countries are still at odds over Israel's nuclear potential, the strained atmosphere between them was eased somewhat following the visit, according to Israeli sources.

Peres met with President Hosni Mubarak and then with Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa.

The two foreign ministers later told reporters that their countries would continue negotiating. Peres said the dispute should not affect the Mideast peace process.

"We are not shouting at each other," Moussa said. "We are talking, and we still have time.

"Relations are such that we can discuss things."

Egypt has threatened not to renew its own signature to the international document unless Israel signs as well. Israel has never officially admitted having nuclear weapons and refuses to open its facilities to international inspection.

The treaty, with 64 signatories, has been in effect since 1970.

Peres made it clear during the meetings that Israel remains adamant in its refusal to attach its own signature to the NPT at this time.

However, Peres did put forward a proposal whereby Israel would consider signing the treaty two years after it contracted bilateral peace treaties with all the states in the region, including Iran, Libya and Iraq, the three nations Israel considers its most implacable foes.

Nazi 'collaborator' probed

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A prominent French businessman with strong ties to cosmetics giant L'Oreal has been placed under investigation by the United States over charges that he collaborated with the Nazis during World War II.

Andre Bettencourt, 75, wrote numerous articles for two pro-Nazi publications during the war, one of which was financed by the Nazi government in Germany.

The accusations against Bettencourt surfaced recently in the French media. Bettencourt, a French senator and former cabinet minister, resigned late last year as deputy chair of L'Oreal.

French Nazi-hunter Serge Klarsfeld echoed the charges in a news conference here last week, calling Bettencourt's wartime writings "an appeal to genocide."

Klarsfeld urged the United States to place Bettencourt on its "Watch List," which would bar the industrialist from entering the country. He emphasized that he was pressing for the U.S. ban because it was one of the few tools available to use against Bettencourt, who has travelled to the United States many times for political and business purposes.

Bettencourt cannot be prosecuted in France for writing propaganda.

"Always I try to fight against not only the Nazis but their accomplices in France," Klarsfeld said.

Eli Rosenbaum, director of the Office of Special Investigations, the U.S. Nazi-hunting arm of the Justice Department, confirmed that an inquiry into Bettencourt's wartime activities was under way.

The results of Klarsfeld's own investigation "are being reviewed as part of an inquiry by the Office of Special Investigations into whether Bettencourt is eligible to enter the United States," Rosenbaum said in a Feb. 14 facsimile to Klarsfeld.

Klarsfeld said at the news conference that during World War II, Bettencourt was a journalist for a publication connected to the Nazi Ministry of Propaganda and the Gestapo.

Bettencourt has apologized in the past for his writings. He also served in the Resistance during World War II and received military honors. But Klarsfeld said Bettencourt's service began 10 days before the liberation of Paris and consisted of raising U.S. funds for French prisoners-of-war.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL), said Tuesday after the news conference that even though he had a great amount of respect for Klarsfeld, he was left with some questions surrounding the location and timing of the press conference.

"I am very skeptical as to the whole purpose of this undertaking," Foxman said, adding that Jewish credibility was at stake. Foxman said he did not understand why a news conference was not held first in Paris or Washington.

The ADL had praised L'Oreal after an initial $7 million investment in Israel last May.

Israel does not produce refugees

By STEPHEN VICTOR

Increasingly shrill accusations have been levelled against Israel by former Soviet citizens who are seeking admission to Canada as "refugees."

These charges must be forcefully confronted.

COMMENTARY

Since 1990, Israel has absorbed over 300,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union. While the absorption process was difficult, the vast majority of the new olim were successfully integrated.

As their Hebrew language skills improve, they are beginning to find employment in their chosen professions. A Russian language press is thriving in Israel and there are daily radio and television broadcasts in Russian.

At the same time, a small number of Russian immigrants are having problems. The most serious difficulties, primarily in the religious and economic domains, are being experienced by families which entered Israel claiming that both husband and wife were Jewish, when in fact one or both partners were not Jewish according to Halachah.

Like all other citizens, the disaffected immigrants are free to take their grievances and claims of discrimination to Israel's network of human rights agencies and independent police and judiciary. The sad fact is, however, that some new olim have chosen not to make use of those resources, precisely because they do not want to be integrated into Israeli society.

They view Israel as a safe and secure refuge from the chaos of post-Communist Russia, and they readily accept the generous assistance package given to all immigrants. But their eyes are cast elsewhere, toward visions of immediate economic prosperity in Western Europe or North America.

In the last few years, a disproportionate number have come to Canada — not as legitimate immigrants, but as refugee claimants, making outlandish charges of having been "persecuted" in Israel, and insisting they will suffer more government persecution if they are denied refugee status in Canada and have to return to Israel.

All Israelis are free to pursue economic opportunity elsewhere. But for some Russian immigrants to attempt to "jump the queue" in Canada by fraudulently claiming to be refugees from a "repressive" Israeli government stretches credulity and disparages Israel's democratic reputation.

What is often overlooked is the fact that the disaffected olim, including the "refugee claimants" in Canada, constitute only a tiny fraction of the one-half million recent immigrants who are proud to make Israel their new home.

In recent weeks, Canadian tribunals have ruled the claims of persecution of "refugees" from Israel to be groundless. This is encouraging. In fact, all such claims should be rejected for what they are — ludicrous.

Let the facts speak for themselves. Israel does not produce refugees. On the contrary, Israel is a country made up of refugees.

Stephen Victor is the national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Charles Bronfman Interviewed:

Investment in Israel is doubly rewarding

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — From his elegant Peel Street headquaters, Charles R. Bronfman can survey Montreal's majestic downtown skyline.

It's a bleak January afternoon and the sunny interior contrasts starkly with the weather outside. The 63-year-old co-chairman of Seagram Company Ltd. is comfortably seated in his gold-tone armchair. He is a man accustomed to weathering storms.

Bronfman's generosity to the Jewish community and the Canadian people is well documented. But his concern for others stretches into the land of Israel.

He has also contributed to its economy, most recently through Claridge Israel Inc., the Canadian-owned company he developed with Jonathan Kolber.

"We had been in Israel for years with Supersol (supermarkets) but there was a confluence of events that influenced the development of Claridge Israel in the late '80s," Bronfman explains.

With the proceeds from the sale of Supersol and other funds, Claridge Israel invested an excess of $100 million (all figures are in US dollars) in an array of Israeli industries. Among them are Osem Group, a producer and distributor of processed foods and beverages; ECI Telecom, a supplier of advanced telecommunications equipment; Teva Pharmaceuticals Ltd., a network of development and production facilities for pharmaceutical and chemical products; and the Jerusalem Report, a bi-weekly news magazine distributed in 52 countries.

Claridge Israel, which is run by Kolber from Tel Aviv, is the largest foreign investor in the country. It plays an active role in developing corporate strategies, but leaves daily management to others, like Dan Propper of the Israel Manufacturers Association, who runs Osem.

Claridge Israel has provided investors with superior returns to date. Before buying into ECI Telecom five years ago, the company spent $500,000 investigating the company. Now Claridge Israel's 17 per cent is worth over $200 million.

Teva Pharmaceuticals has tripled its net income in a year. Teva reported $18.1 million in net profits for the second quarter of 1994, a 28 per cent increase from $13.9 million in the same quarter of 1993. With FDA approval pending, Teva plans marketing COP-I, treatment for multiple sclerosis.

Bronfman says there is something very exciting in an investment that helps the economy of a country and is profitable as well. "We can invest here or in the States, but we don't see these investments do as much for our country as in Israel."

In 1991 Claridge Israel announced its intention to set up a small business development fund for loan guarantees. "I always wondered why Israel didn't have small business development funds like other industrial countries," he says. The government liked the bid tendered by Claridge Israel and they won the first bid, but the second bid went to the Joint Distribution Committee.

Bronfman and Kolber's latest foray into Israel, the Renaissance Fund launched in April 1994, raised $157 million to invest in Israel-related privately held and publicly traded companies.

Seagram Company Co-Chairman Charles Bronfman

The fund is managed by Claridge Israel, the Stockton Partners in New York and their principals Harvey Kreuger, managing director of Lehman Bros. and Allan Batkin, vice-chairman of Kissinger Associates. Other members include Power Corporation of Montreal, the Quebec Pension Fund — Caisse de Depot and Placement du Quebec, the Tisch family of New York and prominent New York bank Goldman Sachs and Company.

One Renaissance Fund investment was Paz Industries, acquired in September 1994 by Claridge Israel and a group of co-investors. Paz, Israel's largest downstream oil and gas marketer, serves a network of 200 gas stations.

Mark Smith, senior vice-president of Claridge Inc. and chief operating officer of Claridge Israel, works closely with Bronfman and Kolber in Montreal and Israel.

He says Bronfman is deeply involved in strategic decisions and acts as a sounding board for Claridge executives in their day-to-day activities. "Mr. Bronfman serves as a tremendous resource for us all."

The youngest of Samuel and Saidye Bronfman's four children, Charles joined Seagram Company after attending McGill University in 1951. "I was intimately involved in the operation of Seagrams for many years but I've been out of operations for five years," says Bronfman, chairman of Seagram's executive committee since 1975 and co-chairman of the company since 1986. "I speak to my brother (Edgar) and my nephew (Edgar Jr.) a lot [at their New York headquarters] but now I'm fundamentally involved in senior policy."

The family trust fund CEMP Investments Ltd. was dismantled in 1987, thus enabling members to branch out independently. Claridge Inc. manages Charles Bronfman's family holdings.

The Bronfman story began in Canada in 1889, when the family fled czarist pogroms in Bessarabia to settle in western Canada. In 1924, Sam and his brothers opened the first distillery in LaSalle, Que. Today, Seagram Company is a global producer and marketer of distilled spirits, wines, juices and mixers with subsidiaries in 36 countries. Profits in 1994 were $265 million.

In addition to its beverage operations, Seagram owns significant common stock positions in E.I. du Pont de Nemours and Company and Time Warner Inc. The Bronfman family owns 36.4 per cent of Seagram's stock, a 24.3 per cent stake in E.I. du Pont de Nemours, and 14.9 per cent of Time Warner.

From 1969 to 1991, Bronfman served as principal owner and chairman of the board of the Montreal Expos, the first major league baseball franchise awarded outside the United States. He shuns praise when commended for his loyalty in selling to a local consortium.

"I'd rather keep it here, than have it go elsewhere," says the modest Baseball Hall of Famer. "Most decent people try to do this."

Improving quality of life is a Bronfman family tradition. In chronicling two centuries of Jewish life in Canada in A Coat of Many Colors, Irving Abella tells how Sam Bronfman accepted a leadership role in Canadian Jewish Congress in 1939 out of concern for the community.

Charles Bronfman agrees his parents were wonderful role models. "I remember very well how I worked in the community because I was my parents' son." After his father's death in 1971, Bronfman decided to play an expanded role. He remembers telling a delegation from the community: "Okay, I'm ready. I'd love to accept whatever challenges you have for me."

Currently chairman of the Charles Rosner Bronfman (CRB) Foundation, Bronfman also serves as a trustee of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, as honorary president of United Israel Appeal of Canada, honorary chairman of Canada-Israel Securities Ltd. (State of Israel Bonds), and chairman of the board of governors of Canadian Jewish Congress.

In recognition of his contribution to Canada, Bronfman received the Companion of the Order of Canada in 1992, and was made a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada. He is also a recipient of honorary degrees from universities in Israel and North America.

Israeli banker links peace, prosperity

TEL AVIV — An atmosphere of peace in the Middle East will provide dynamic economic development for Israel and its neighbors, but the Palestinian Authority will require foreign aid to improve the economic condition of the average Palestinian, the chairman of the board of Bank Hapoalim said recently.

Addressing the conference on The Future of the Mediterranean Area After the Peace Process, held in Paris on Feb. 20 under the patronage of French Prime Minister Eduard Balladur, Emanuel Sharon expressed optimism in envisioning the region working "towards a new economic space."

A vital stake

Given the prerequisites of free economies maintained by Arabs and Israelis, mechanisms established for the cooperative solution of common problems and safe coexistence, Sharon envisioned that Palestine, along with Jordan and Egypt, as well as Lebanon and Syria could successfully follow the examples of the Asian "tigers." These all started their growth process by manufacturing the labor intensive parts for Western products, he noted.

Israel, he said, has a vital stake in the economic success of the Palestinians and its Arab neighbors to ensure the stability and security of the entire area. But Israel's own economic gains from peace will not be centred on exports to the neighboring Arab world, but on technology geared to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development and other Western markets.

"The Palestinians can complement Israeli manufacturers by contracting to do the part of the production process in which they have an advantage, as has already happened in some industries," he said.

"The big economic gain for Israel is peace itself. In spite of its many advantages as a scientific and technological centre, Israel has never been a target for international private sector investors reluctant to go to politically unstable parts of the world. Israel, in peace, will get its fair share of international investment.

"Investors are important to Israel, not so much because of the funds they invest, but mostly because of their access to markets and technologies. If peace prevails, Israel would also be able to safely reduce its military expenditures, diverting them to civilian investment and consumption. This, in fact, would be the biggest economic advantage to Israel."

Miracle Food Mart

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

TORONTO—Miracle Food Mart has always tried to meet the needs of its kosher customers, says a company executive.

Bill Sheine, vice-president of marketing for the Great Atlantic and Pacific Company (A&P), the parent company since 1990, said Miracle Food Mart was the first major supermarket chain in Ontario to offer its customers kosher meat and it's the only supermarket chain in North America selling live carp.

"It always had more knowledge of the needs of the Jewish community than the competition, because of the Steinberg tradition," he said. "We knew what our customers wanted."

Miracle Food Mart was part of Steinbergs, the former Montreal-based supermarket chain, until 1988.

Three of the stores have a large Jewish customer base and sell live carp: the Miracle stores at Bathurst and Glencairn, and Bathurst and Sheppard, and the Ultra Mart at Bathurst and Steeles.

"Freshness is one of the things that differentiates us from the competition," said Sheine, who has been with the company for 30 years. "Our motto is 'Miracle means fresh.' "

Seafood director Ken Duff told The CJN that customers have asked the stores to expand their selection of smoked fish. "We plan to have a bigger selection of smoked salmon than any other retail store," he said.

Duff, previously the assistant director of meat, is familiar with the kosher department. Miracle had a kashering facility at the Cedarcroft and Bathurst store until three years ago. The meat now comes from Iowa.

"The Iowa beef costs us more, but we're willing to give the customers what they want," Duff said.

The large cuts of meat are cut to specification at Lazar Yitzchock, a federally approved glatt processing facility.

Three years ago, Miracle introduced its Master Choice line quality in-house products. The 600-product line includes many kosher items, the most popular of which are cookies and sorbet-ice creams, said line manager Paula Zivot.

Master Choice is sold by all A&P supermarkets in both the United States and Canada. The Canadian stores include the Dominion supermarket chain.

There are 46 Miracle Food Mart Stores in Canada, 11 of which are Ultra Marts, the larger stores with pharmacies.

A&P operates more than 1,200 stores in both the U.S. and Canada with sales in the $10-billion range. The 240 Canadian stores make up 20 per cent of those sales, Sheine said.

Ultimately being part of a large corporation helped Miracle Mart rebound from a 13-week strike this summer, according to Sheine.

Maintaining a loyal customer base is increasingly more important to Miracle, Sheine said.

"Everybody wants a piece of the grocery business. But they can't compete with us on variety, freshness and service."

Investment in Israel is doubly rewarding

[Cont'd. from page 31]

An attentive listener, Bronfman enjoys dialogue, especially when the subject is CRB Foundation which he co-chairs with his wife Andrea.

CRB focuses on Canadian awareness through heritage programs, in addition to economic and peace programs in Israel.

The heritage component was sparked in 1981, when Bronfman was first awarded the Order of Canada at Rideau Hall in Ottawa. "I always decried the fact Canadians didn't seem to have any heroes," he says. "While listening to some of the citations, I thought to myself 'The only people that ever hear of this are sitting right in this room.' "

Working with other partners, CRB produces Heritage Minutes, lively Canadian history shorts shown on television and at cinemas. Bronfman considers his family's establishment of the Institute for the Study of Canada at McGill University in 1993 "a natural outgrowth of Heritage Program," albeit one not funded by CRB Foundation.

At CRB, Bronfman and his wife make a good team: "I get these big ideas but she is the one to translate them into reality." He relates the pleasure they derive from attending CRB events, such as the Sunday Culture for army youth in Israel and a recent heritage launch benefiting students studying history in Ontario.

"Every Jewish child should have the opportunity to visit Israel before the age of 21," says Bronfman, whose efforts at CRB in conjunction with other Jewish communal groups have organized 40 different tours. His son, Stephen, 31, and daughter, Ellen, 26, are both actively involved in the CRB Foundation.

Bronfman's vision of Israel reflects his faith in the future. He hopes Jews in the Diaspora will adopt his pragmatic outlook.

"I think we Jews have some decisions to make. The new Israel, one that is economically strong, is wonderful to see but it presents a challenge. What's our role in North America going to be? People talk of continuity. I prefer to talk about renewal. I think it's very exciting."

Eye on Arts

Mosaic Theatre Productions, whose production of The Diary of Anne Frank finishes its run with two more performances in Toronto this weekend, "is a two-hour show in two acts, with music, voice-over, full stage and sets and full scenery," according to its artistic director Rivka Schechter. "We're an amateur theatre company, basically, but we have very professional production values."

Schechter has a long and distinguished history in amateur and dinner theatre. For some 16 years, she led the Beth Israel Players in Calgary, an award-winning amateur theatre group. Then she and a partner opened the Glenmore Dinner Theatre, a professional dinner theatre which they operated for eight years. At that point, Schechter and her husband moved to San Antonio, Tex., and opened Star Theatre Productions, a dinner theatre which still operates to this day.

Five years ago, the Schechters moved to Toronto, and Rivka established Mosaic Theatre Productions. So far, Mosaic has put on four plays — The Cemetery Club, Plaza Suite, I Never Saw Another Butterfly and now The Diary of Anne Frank, which is being presented under the aegis of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee. The plays are given public and school performances.

Eight scheduled school performances of Anne Frank were quickly sold out, Schechter says. "There's a big waiting list for schools," says Schechter, who also teaches at United Synagogue Day School. "Many people remember our previous performances and want more."

The two remaining public performances of The Diary of Anne Frank are set for 8 p.m. on March 4 and 5 at the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation, 12 Heaton St., North York. For tickets ($12), call 416-636-6665.

Stars Celebrate the Bloor JCC: A recent financial restructuring is breathing new life into Toronto's Bloor Street Jewish Community Centre (JCC). The facility, situated at 750 Spadina Ave., is independent of the former northern Jewish Community Centre, now known as the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

To help the Bloor JCC reduce its $3-million mortgage, some of its more celebrated members are staging The Stars Celebrate the Bloor JCC, a fundraising evening March 4. Performers include Don Francks, Nancy White, Theresa Tova, David Gale, Marie-Lynn Hammond and Jay Jackson & Take Three. Tickets are $15 in advance (from the front office) or $20 at the door. All proceeds go the Bloor JCC.

A recent Eye on Arts column incorrectly stated that Theresa Tova would be performing March 4 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. Please note that Tova is set to appear that evening at the Bloor JCC. It promises to be a night to remember. Doors open 8 p.m. and concert begins 8:30 p.m.

Physical Feast: The dance festival by this name, featuring some 30 dancers in 14 pieces, open recently at the Buddies In Bad Times Theatre, 12 Alexander St. in Toronto, and continues to March 12.

The festival is being co-produced by Adrienne Rothenberg, who runs Tutoring Plus, a successful tutoring service. "For the first time, I'm applying the expertise and administrative skills that I learned in business to a more artistic project," she says.

Rothenberg claims a lifelong interest in dance and has been surrounded by dance all her life. Her mother, Goldie Brass, "was a modern dancer back in the 1940s. She danced at the Y down on Spadina and even before it was on Spadina."

Rothenberg has also been inspired by her co-producer Claudia Moore, a well-known dancer who is both the curator of the festival and Rothenberg's sister-in-law. For tickets, call 416-975-8555.

Brief Notes: Six young men, wearing kippot and singing a capella, make up the band Beat'Achon, whose rich vocal harmonies, vibrant rhythms and Hebrew lyrics have won over many Jewish audiences. Hear them March 4 at the Sha'arei Shomayim Synagogue, Toronto, in a concert sponsored by Camp Moshava. Tickets available at Israel's, Matana, Negev and the camp office, 416-630-7578.

Rikudiyah Israeli Dance Festival for Children: Some 21 groups present a color showcase of Israel dance at the Tait MacKenzie Gym, York University, March 5 at 2:30 p.m. Tickets (adults $5, children $1) on sale at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Klezmer band coming to town

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Staid Convocation Hall may never be the same after the Klezmer Conservatory Band does its gig there March 26, especially after performers in this renowned group do their version of Der Shray of de Vilde Katchka (The Cry of the Wild Duck).

This band, making its first appearance in Toronto, has been all over the world urging people to dance in the aisles to their unique combination of Eastern Europe shtetl music, American ragtime and jazz.

They are coming to raise funds for the four Yiddish courses of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto and to help mark its 25th anniversary. A gala reception for 400 patrons of Yiddish studies takes place next door at Knox College after the concert.

The approach of the Klezmer Conservatory Band to music is as irreverent as leader Hankus Netsky's description of old-time klezmer musicians. "They're okay to play at your daughter's wedding, but you wouldn't want your daughter to marry one," he says.

Netsky is bemused by the Conservatory tag applied to the 12-member band because the real klezmer musicians never went near a conservatory and probably couldn't read a note. "They were a rag-tag group who travelled from place to place like gypsies and the European Jewish weddings meant a week's work."

Though the original klezmers were not blue bloods, the Klezmer Conservatory Band has established for itself a real niche in the world of music.

One of their numbers Leena from Palestina (that Eddie Cantor made famous) was the background music for a scene in the film Enemies, a Love Story. The band recently collaborated with the American Repertory Theatre and the American Music Theatre Festival on a new musical based on I.B. Singer's play Sclemiel the First. And that nimble performer, Joel Gray (his father Mickey Katz sang klezmer songs) worked with the band on Borschtcapades 94.

For information about the concert or the gala, call 787-0526.

Photos depict Turkish Jews

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Corresondent

Entitled Turkish Jews: 500 Years Of Harmony, the exhibition is funded by the Quincentennial Foundation of Istanbul, an organization established in 1989 by a group of Jewish and Muslim Turks to celebrate the 500th anniversary of "the welcoming of the Jewish people to the Ottoman Empire after their expulsion from Spain in 1492," and produced by the Judah L. Magnes Museum in Berkely, Calif.

The 50-photo exhibit has toured the United States and Europe since October 1991 and was at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Synagogue in 1992.

One of the photos on display at the exhibit in Hamilton.

The Hamilton showing was organized by Anshe Sholom education director Dr. Ronnie Miller, with help from the adult education committee headed by Dr. Anthony MacFarlane and a "very generous grant" from the Jewish National Fund through Hamilton-based emissary Yoram Gordon.

Approximately 200 people, including members of the surrounding Turkish communities, attended the opening.

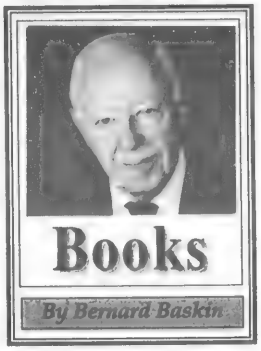
Turkish embassy representative Hasan Servt Oktem and keynote speaker Salem Alaton both said Jews and Turks alike benefited from their long co-existence.

Even before the expulsion from Spain in 1492, Oktem said, Jews expelled from other European countries found refuge in Turkey, where they "were always seen as elements enriching Turkish society."

When Germany began dismissing Jewish professors and scientists in the 1930s, they were "almost immediately" offered positions in Turkish universities, Oktem said, while during World War II, Turkey provided refuge for Jews from Bulgaria, Greece, Yugoslavia, Poland and other occupied countries.

"I am confident that friendship and understanding between Turkey and Israel will go on forever," he said of the two Mideast democracies.

Alaton, a Toronto journalist, said if not for the "embrace by the Ottoman Empire ... [there would not have been] the continuation of a substantial Sephardi culture today."



Cultures In Conflict: Christians, Muslims & Jews in the Age of Discovery, by Bernard Lewis (Oxford University Press, $22.50).

The year 1492 was a watershed in European history. It marked not only the discovery of the New World, but also Catholic Spain's victory over Islam after four centuries of struggle on the Iberian Peninsula, and the expulsion of her Jews.

The repercussions for the three religions were profound and enduring — and they are briliantly explored by Bernard Lewis, the outstanding Western scholar in Islamic history and culture.

In three brief essays, based on a series of university lectures, Lewis provides an overview of the cultural and political clashes between Christian Europe and the Islamic world from the late 15th to the 19th centuries.

The expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, though by far the best known, was by no means the first. In the late 13th and early 14th centuries, Jews were expelled by royal decree from the kingdoms of Naples, England and France, as well as from many cities and principalities. Nor was it the last. Only a few years later, in 1496, the Jews of Portugal, plus an estimated 100,000 Spanish Jews who had found a brief and illusory refuge among them, were subjected to an even harsher expulsion.

Most of the Jewish refugees settled in Islamic countries, largely Turkey.

It is true that during the first six centuries of Islam, the period embracing the so-called "Golden Age," the Jews of Islam experienced far greater security and far more integration than their brethren in Europe.

Medieval Christian superstition

Such irrational ideas as the association of the Jews with the devil, a well-known feature of medieval Christian superstition, had little place in the popular Arab imagination. The terrible blood libels of Europe were absent. Expulsions did not occur and there was the little or no persecution of Jewish converts to Islam for alleged unfaithfulness to the new religion. Indeed, over a period of several centuries, Jews achieved positions of authority and influence, and Jewish culture and literary creativity were of the highest order.

But, it must be emphasized, Jews generally experienced a large number of discriminatory and humiliating disabilities under Islamic law. These included prohibitions against building or repairing houses of worship, against holding public religious ceremonies, against bearing arms and against holding public office. They were also subject to an onerous poll tax. The twin themes of segregation and humiliation that run through the Islamic sources seem to rival if not exceed the legal restrictions and pariah status imposed upon the Jews in the Christian West.

Fortunately many of these laws were not strictly enforced and were easily evaded. Moreover, in Muslim theology, Mohammed is not regarded as a messiah or Islam as a fulfilment of Judaism. The Jewish rejection of Muhammed, therefore, never entailed the same theological challenge to Islam that was implicit in the Jewish rejection of Jesus. Hence, Islam did not invest anywhere near the same polemical energies expended by Christendom to refute Judaism and to convert the Jews. It is noteworthy that the Talmud was burned in Paris, not in Cairo or Baghdad.

Why did the West ultimately gain the upper hand over the Islamic world? The reasons are numerous and include the Muslim inability to respond to cultural change. Lewis points out, for example, that the East's rejection of printing, the use of mills for generating energy and the unwillingness to use gunpowder in warfare led to eventual inferiority. Another factor was the unwillingness to grant a measure of equality to women. "Western civilization was richer for women's presence; Muslim civilization was poorer for its absence."

This volume is part of a growing need to understand Islamic history and to come to terms with its assertive challenges to Western supremacy.

Theatre, concerts, exhibits

There's more to Florida than sun, sand and sea

By ROSE KLEINER
Special to The CJN

The arts are flourishing in South Florida as never before. The area has become a magnet for artists and tourists who are making theatre, concerts and exhibits as much a part of the Florida experience as sun, sand and sea.

Almost 60,000 people recently attended an outdoor concert by Luciano Pavarotti, on the beach at 10th Street in Miami.

Several South Florida arts events are of Jewish interest.

The Florida Jewish Theatre at the West Palm Beach Jewish Centre, is running All My Tatele's on Wednesday evenings, until April.

In historic Stuart, the Lyric Theatre hosts classical plays, music and dance recitals. The town's Barn Theatre presents five shows each season.

Fiddler on the Roof opens March 1 at the Royal Palm Dinner Theatre, Boca Raton. The musical The Rothchilds comes to the Coconut Grove Playhouse on March 28. The Boca Pops presents A Tribute to Henry Mancini March 29-30.

Through March you can see the review, And The Check Is In The Mail, at the Norris Centre, in Cambier Park, Naples. Sugar, a musical based on the film, Some Like It Hot, will be at the Naples Dinner Theatre until March 5, and West Side Story starts there March 8. Lend Me A Tenor comes to the Naples Players theatre on March 4, and Broadway Ladies starts there on March 22.

The New World Symphony will give a free Sunset Concert at South Pointe Park, Miami Beach, on March 11 and a free recital at the Lincoln Theatre March 20. A French and Spanish Festival presented by this Symphony on March 25 will feature Ilana Vered, playing Ravel, Constant and Saint-Saens.

Temple Beth Am, Miami, will host a children's concert, given by the Florida Philharmonic Ensemble, on March 5.

The Annual Purim Ball of the Jewish National Fund will be held at the Fontainebleau Hilton Hotel on March 26.

On the Gulf coast, the Philharmonic Centre for the Arts in Naples presents a salute to George Gershwin, with pianist Michael Chertook March 24 to 26.

Some of the finest resorts can be found along both Florida coasts, and some have package deals even in the winter season. To the north, the Indian River Plantation is a quiet retreat near the beach, in the town of Stuart.

In the Palm Beach area, the PGA Resort is a world-famous site for sports and relaxation. A series of Health Seminars at the resort this winter will be open to the public and free of charge.

To the south, the Boca Raton Resort and Club, a five-star establishment, offers four types of accommodation — the historic Cloister, the Tower, the Beach Club and the Golf Villas.

Further south, in Aventura, Turnberry Isle is another beautiful, spacious resort, with closer access to Miami Beach. Among the many services in its spa, one can choose Dead Sea mud treatments and Dead Sea mineral baths.

Antique automobiles

A number of art exhibits can also be viewed in south Florida this season. Boca Raton will hold its 13th annual Celebration of Art and Entertainment March 3 to 5.

The Elliott Museum in Stuart has an interesting display of antique automobiles. Gilbert's Bar House of Refuge, also in Stuart, and listed in the National Register of Historic Places, used to be a rescue centre for shipwrecked sailors.

The galleries and gardens of the Philharmonic Centre in Naples, which are walking distance from the Registry Resort, have changing exhibits and guided docent tours. The Art Gallery at the Registry Resort has works by Renoir, Calder and Rockwell, as well as by contemporary artists.

Marco Island's annual craft fair will be held on March 18.

Among the synagogues in the area is Temple Shalom in Naples, which offers adult education programs in addition to its religious services.

The Jewish Centre of Marco Island holds services on Saturday mornings and has an adult education series through the winter. It is walking distance from the Marriott hotel and the beach area.

Travel guides: Don't leave home without them

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Whatever your vacation plans, don't leave home without a reputable travel guide. It will help you plan your trip and probably save you time and trouble.

For foot-loose travellers, here are some of the latest guides, published by Lonely Planet, and distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books:

• Eastern Caribbean focuses on 16 islands ranging from Anguilla to Trinidad and Tobago. Collectively, they offer balmy weather, white sand beaches, turquoise waters and lush rainforests — an unbeatable combination.

• Venezuela unfurls a tantalizing vista of Caribbean coastline, snow-capped mountains, dense jungles, the world's highest waterfall and mysterious sandstone mesas (tepuis).

• Outback Australia conjures up images of desolate deserts, endless landscapes, Aboriginal culture and exotic flora and fauna.

• New South Wales is an eclectic melange of big cities, rustic villages, surf beaches, lakes, parks, pubs and wineries.

• Australian Phrasebook unlocks the patois of the country. With this pocket-size book as your key, you will no longer wonder about the meaning of words like bum-nuts, weakie or dunny.

• The Best Places To Kiss In the Northwest is for lovers. Here you will find distinctive accommodations, scenic drives and parks in British Columbia, Washington and Oregon well worth visiting.

No matter where you go, you'll need good maps.

The Quick Reference World Atlas (Thomas Allen), as well as Rand McNally's Road Atlas (Thomas Allen) of Canada, the United States and Mexico, will get you there with a minimum of fuss and bother.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

Ringed by populous industrial cities like Manchester and Sheffield, England's Peaks District is a treasured national park that covers a mere 542 square miles and provides breathing space, uncluttered natural vistas, and hiking and biking trails for millions of visitors yearly.

Unlike most national parks in Canada, the Peaks District is home to numerous picturesque towns such as Bakewell and Buxton and Castleton, as well as numerous other attractions.

Years ago, I hiked along miles of country roads here, passing through farmers' fields and the agricultural villages of Monyash and Youlgreave, eventually winding up at Arbor Low, one of several local prehistoric monuments. Arbor Low was once a smaller version of the famous Stonehenge, but its stone slabs have fallen and now lie in a clockface arrangement. How peculiar it was to see dairy cows lapping up water from the hollows in these mysterious stones, supposedly brought there about 1700 BCE.

An entrance to Chatsworth Hall.

During a recent return to the Peaks District, I visited Chatsworth Hall, a somewhat more contemporary monument, the approach to which is memorable. One rounds a bend in a park road and sees a pastoral mirage in the distance, an enormous cream-colored grand hall floating above grazing sheep and deer.

Maintained down the centuries by the fabulously wealthy Dukes of Devonshire (the 11th duke and his family are now in residence), Chatsworth is England's answer to Versailles. Open to the public, it is a kind of live-in fine art museum featuring, for instance, a Breughel in the China Closet, a Tintoretto on the West Stairs, a Rembrandt in the Sculpture Gallery. The house itself is richly furnished and decorated throughout with painted walls and ceilings, woodcarvings and elaborate inlay furniture.

More suitable for troglodytes, the region's Blue John Cavern provides egress into a weird underground world, some 50 metres below ground, where stalactites and stalagmites have been growing undisturbed for millenia. When our guide momentarily extinguishes the light, the darkness is absolute: you cannot see your hand in front of your face. All one hears is the incessant dripping of water through the layers of rock.

After the chilling subterranean darkness, daylight is a welcome sight. Green even in February, these idyllic rolling hills are subdivided only by farmers' neat stone fences and the occasional highway and back road.

The weather can be clear in one vale and foggy in the next. One night, as our van topped a peak along a narrow road hemmed in by fences, a thick "pea-soup" fog suddenly enveloped us. The headlights could not penetrate the white curtain, but they did shine on a hiker wandering the moors. In an accent as dense as the fog, he told us he was going to Macclesfield, and to Macclesfield we carried him.

Set amidst the hills like a precious jewel, the town of Buxton has been known for its mineral springs since Roman times; the waters were once believed to have a curative properties. Now what chiefly impresses visitors to the former spa town are its fine Georgian and Victorian buildings, as well as the Buxton Opera House, erected in 1903, which is home to several renowned arts festivals. The town boasts several charming and reasonably-priced old hotels, such as the Leewood.

Our last night in England was spent at the Etrop Grange Hotel, situated near Manchester Airport, but easily within range of the Peaks. Formerly a stylish Georgian manor, Etrop Grange is one of the nicest and most unlikely airport hotels you will encounter. Two minutes from the terminal, it's a quiet, comfortable, convenient spot to stay if you plan on flying out on Air Canada's direct flight to Toronto in the morning.

Cultural Revival in Lebanon: It's amazing what a ceasefire will do.

Some 20 years after the Lebanese civil war forced it to close, the once-famous Baalbek International Festival may be resuscitated for 1996. Situated amidst the ruins of the ancient classical city of Baalbek, the arts festival would be the government's way of signalling to the world that the country is again safe for tourists.

Although festival organizers are presently facing a lack of accommodation and infrastructure, one wishes them well. Before it was torn apart by war, Lebanon was an exclusive international tourist destination, and any renewal of its tourist industry might help dislodge the terrorists who point their guns and missiles at Israel from Lebanon's southern hills.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles.

Museum shows man's dark side

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

"I hope visitors to the Museum of Tolerance will realize that to all they can see here, there is only one alternative: tolerance towards all mankind."

— Simon Wiesenthal

It is a dramatic contrast to leave a cab at 9786 West Pico Blvd. in sunny Los Angeles and walk into the tunnels and corridors of the extraordinary new Beit Hashoah (House of the Holocaust)-Museum of Tolerance. It is a descent into humanity's darker side.

Through interactive exhibits, visitors are confronted with a hands-on experiential museum designed to challenge and educate them to explore their own biases and attitudes about racism.

The museum focuses on two themes: the dynamics of prejudice and racism in America, and the history of the Holocaust — the ultimate example of man's inhumanity to man. The museum shows the connections between modern day bigotry and the horrors of half a century ago.

"We didn't want to present the Holocaust unaccompanied by other lessons," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean and founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, and the driving force behind the museum. "The Museum says, 'You may not be Jewish and you may not be a Nazi, but you have a stake in this because hatred was not banished [with] Adolf Hitler — it outlived him.' "

The Museum of Tolerance, which covers half a city block, was built for $50 million in 1993 by the centre, a human rights and research organization named after the Austrian Jew who helped bring over 1,000 Nazi war criminals to justice.

As you enter the museum's first section, you approach either a red door marked "Prejudiced" or a green one, "Not Prejudiced." (Visitors who choose this door find it locked.) In the Whisper Gallery, you see, hear and experience a wide variety of racial, ethnic and sexist slurs: "Loud-mouthed kike! Lousy Gook! They're taking all the good jobs," says a Hispanic woman on a video screen. "Get Whitey. Faggot," screams someone else. "What are you going to do about it Jew boy?"

At The Other America exhibit, visitors find a wall-sized computerized map showing the location of 250 U.S. hate groups, and an electronic timeline of the deadly L.A. riots challenges you to decide who was to blame.

Ain't you Gotta Right?, a 16-screen video wall on the struggle for civil rights in America, splices together the words of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. and video footage offers searing images of segregation and freedom marches. A spotlessly dressed black girl walks up the steps of her newly desegregated school, a National Guardsman beside her.

Next comes the history of the Holocaust. On entering the Tolerance Centre, each visitor receives a photo passport with the story of a child. Throughout the 2½ hour tour the passport is updated, and when the tour ends, the ultimate fate of the child is revealed.

The Wannsee Conference is chillingly re-enacted, when 14 people plan the Final Solution of the Jewish Question on Jan. 20, 1942. Visitors pass the walls of the Warsaw Ghetto, hearing the stirring reflections of Mordecai Anielewicz on the eve of the uprising. An illuminated map of the vast European railroad network depicts the deportation to concentration camps.

Visitors then walk through a replica of the gates of Auschwitz. In a bunker resembling a gas chamber, monitors show films of Nazi atrocities, alongside stories of the courage of those who stood up to the Nazis. The exit sign asks "Who Is Responsible?"

A rotating series of photos identify the guilty: diabolical leaders, blind followers, henchmen and ordinary people indifferent to the slaughter of innocents.

Acts of anti-Semitism

Visitors conclude their tour in the Global Situation Room, a hi-tech setting where visitors view headlines describing recent acts of bigotry and anti-Semitism.

Ten thousand original documents, tens of thousands of photographs, more than 1,500 artifacts and memorabilia (including passports issued by Raoul Wallenberg), and over 300 original works of art, rare books and diaries are featured.

Some people were visibly upset during the tour. Rev. Cecil Murray, pastor of the First African Methodist Episcopal Church in south-central Los Angeles, addressed the museum's question of personal responsibility in a society of ethnic and racial conflict: "The Museum of Tolerance should be required viewing for anyone who has a moral imperative that pulls them through life."

Robert Sattin, died Feb. 13 in Calgary at age 88. Bob came to Alberta from Kherson, USSR at 18. He served throughout WWII with the 6th Field Regiment of the Royal Canadian Artillery and, in addition to his medals, he brought home an English war bride, Esther, his partner and helpmate for 54 years. As well as running his businesses, Bob volunteered his time to fellow Jewish and artillery veterans, supporters of Israel and Soviet immigrants. Survived by his wife; sons Graham (Marsha) of Toronto and Allan (Sharon) of Calgary; and grandchildren Amy, Bernie, Rachel and Jeffrey. Donations to the Jewish War Veterans.

Devoted daughter, Paula Kane, deeply mourns the passing of her dear father, Joe Koppel, in Manchester, England. Sadly missed by Maurice, grandchildren Sean & Leigh.

Tyszler, Huma passed away after a seven-week illness, January 10, 1995 in Vancouver, B.C. She died at home, surrounded by her children and grandchildren. She was devoted to her family, who lovingly cared for her at home during the last seven weeks of her life. She was a loving and devoted wife, mother, grandmother and a loyal friend. Interment took place on January 13 at Mt. Sinai Cemetary in Toronto, where she was laid to rest near her beloved husband Hersz (Harry) Peretz Tyszler. She is survived by her son, Marcel, of Los Angeles, daughter Sylviane Feder of Vancouver, and grandchildren Hersh Tyszler and Leanne, Jean Paul and Shanon Feder. She was 83 years old. She will be missed and fondly remembered by all those whose lives she touched.

SPRING FASHION
MONDI

More classic than classic, Mondi's dashing black and white combination offers club style details and a flattering fit.

Mondi focuses on fabric finesse for fashion-conscious women

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

Mondi Collections for Spring/Summer '95 cover all aspects of life, from boardroom to beach. The company's new logo indicates exciting things to come in '95. Each collection is named after a place, reflecting Mondi's global appeal.

"We're moving forward with a fresh, new look," says Jennifer Elliott, Director of Retail Stores for Mondi in Canada. Fabric is the magic word at Mondi this spring. The international design house has created stunning blends that look, feel and wear well.

"Mondi works hard to come up with innovative fabrics that respond to the needs of today's women," observes Elliott, adding that fabric blending has come a long way in the last few years.

Mondi highlights lilac and pine in the stunning silk linen Boa Vista collection. The fabric is esthetically pleasing yet wrinkles less than 100 per cent linen. The dynamic darks add a dramatic dimension to conventional summer collections. Mondi's sheer Asian print blouses can be worn over a camisole or body suit.

Mondi's astute European design team has discovered that acetate helps linen retain its shape. Among the impressive ensembles in the Fleet Street collection is a crisp cotton vest and blazer trimmed in navy. Co-ordinated with a navy blouse and trousers, it's collegiate yet sophisticated.

Versatile vests are very much in vogue. Traffic for travel, vests dress up an outfit and replace a jacket in warm weather. The accent on detail is apparent in all Mondi groupings. Back sashes, lacing and belts enhance vests and jackets.

"Vests are extremely attractive," says Elliott, pointing out navy embroidery on a white vest. "This represents an old monogram from trousseau linen."

A different entry in the same collection comes in navy chiffon. This modern translucent look hails from Italy. The group includes dresses featuring beautiful batik prints.

The maritime or navigational theme is apparent in Mondi's dashing double-breasted black blazer decorated with gleaming gold buttons. Teamed with a striped T-shirt, bermudas or trousers, it's perfect for dinner at the yacht club or dinner on the town.

"It's a pleasure for summer because it drapes like silk and doesn't crease," says Elliott. "Here we're using technology to avoid heavy wrinkles of summer but give that natural fabric look." Mother of pearl buttons and colorful print scarves add finesse to jackets and other apparel.

The Madagascar collection offers an alternate safari choice. This time it's more of a structured look. Gold buttons lend a military air to blazers. The color scheme is camel, pine, and Bordeaux.

Once again fabric comes into play with a wool/linen blend that is less apt to wrinkle. Asian/African prints complement the collection. The Piazza di Spania collection is less suity than the norm for Mondi. The silky pajama and lingerie style outfits drape comfortably. Small floral prints dot pristine white backgrounds.

Peu de Pêche contributes a soft touch to the fabric network. An enzyme finish lends a smooth peachskin feel to linen polyester. The Place Vendôme collection showcases this phenomenal fabric.

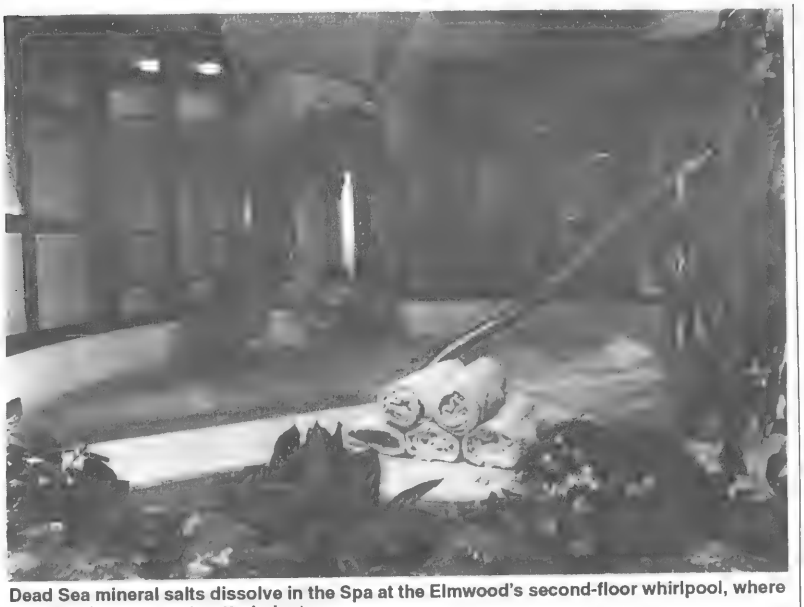
Braun, another upscale choice under the Mondi banner, focuses on golf and weekend wear. Each grouping includes striking color combinations: rose, turquoise, and white; banana, cherry and navy; fuchsia, white and navy. Bermudas, pants, knits, vests, sweat suits, shorts and leggings are among the sporty offerings.

Mondi apparel, sizes 4-16, is available at Ogilvy and Holt Renfrew in Montreal and in Toronto at Hazelton Lanes, Eaton Centre, Bayview Village, and Holt Renfrew. For Braun, also in sizes 4-16, visit Mondi Collection stores in Hazelton Lanes, Toronto, and Ogilvy in Montreal.

Fiber has silky touch

The Sahara collection offers a sizzling safari interpretation. Warm shades of camel, crème and crimson do justice to Tencell, a brand new fabric also referred to as techno-silk. This innovative man-made viscose fiber has a silky touch and wears well.

An interplay of fabrics, light crème nuances, a breezy pajama-style and variations for every summer day.



Dead Sea mineral salts dissolve in the Spa at the Elmwood's second-floor whirlpool, where clients relax amongst potted plants.

Elmwood's spa services run gamut from A to Zee

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

It is a February afternoon at the Spa at the Elmwood, and all is well within its pink-and-mint walls.

Fresh fruit juices are proffered from silver trays, piles of glossy beauty magazines spill onto tabletops and white-coated estheticians slip silently through the sparkling clean rooms.

I have been invited to the 13-year-old spa, located near the intersection of Dundas and Yonge streets at 18 Elm St.(977-6751), to sample some of its more than 60 services.

Close to 15,000 people come through the second-floor spa doors each year (men make up 10 per cent of the clientele). Everyone is promised peace and pampering, a pledge the 42 spa staff work hard to fulfil.

It begins with hostess Sharon Manolov. Her smile is genuine, her voice warm and her attention flattering. "I treat everyone like a king or a queen," she explains. "You're not just a Mr. or a Mrs. Smith. You walk out of here feeling like a million bucks."

But before that, you have to shuffle around in paper slippers, which Sharon carries for me — along with a robe, lock, towels and a plastic bag in which to take home wet bathing suits — to the changeroom.

There are two changerooms, one a cramped space on the second floor with small lockers. I am taken upstairs to the other changeroom, which belongs to the Curzons at the Elmwood women's fitness club. Here, holders of any of the spa's packages ($99 to $595) can use the club's steamroom, sauna, indoor-outdoor whirlpool and swimming pool. A whirlpool on the second floor is for everyone.

I remove my jewelry and underwear as instructed for the upcoming massage and hair treatments. Clients can request female staff out of modesty.

I don't feel modest, I feel stupid in my green terrycloth robe. While the robe is thick and properly closed, the effect is more hospital patient than pampered royalty.

I am greeted by Suzanne Gregory, the registered massage therapist who offers aromatherapy treatments two days a week.

Facials are part of more than 50 services available.

Suzanne leads me into a room made specially fragrant with pine needles to help ease my red and raw nose, stuffed by a nasty cold. Together we go over the 10 or so scented oils from Germany and decide which will be applied during the hour-long massage ($75).

Mental vacation

First is an invigorating rosemary oil for my legs, which Suzanne says will improve circulation to my fuzzy head, then soothing rose and lavendar oils for my back, tangerine and lemon for my arms and eucalyptus for my neck and shoulders "to help open your nasal passages even more," she says. The smells wafting upward are delicious, and I feel as warm and tranquil as a Florida citrus grove in summer.

I pour myself off the heated massage table and into the spa's hair salon. There stands head stylist Zelia Fletcher, a tall woman wearing Birkenstock sandals and crushed velvet in a rich shade of copper to match her hair.

"I'm not the one going home with your hair," is how she sums up her work philosophy. Zee, as she is known, makes a point of listening to those seated in her chair. She quickly agrees to keep my medium-length hair as is, using her scissors only to even the sides, and focuses her attention instead on applying auburn hair color (with style $45, with cut $85) for a much-needed lift.

Spa staff are expected to not just to cater to the clients' needs, but anticipate them, says general manager Lynda Finlay. "You can check your brain at the door," she promises.

Many of the spa's largely baby boomer and professional clients want a mental vacation, she says, especially if they cannot get on an airplane. "Here, you feel like you went away on a vacation, but you didn't have to leave the city."

That is not to say that the Spa at the Elmwood does not have its exotic touches. Clients can eat a hot vegetarian meal brought up from the Bangkok Garden Thai restaurant downstairs, accented with carved fruit and gently spiced, or soak in mineral salts from the Dead Sea.

The clients can come from far away places, too. Monica, in for a visit from Ireland, was spending a blustery afternoon with a girlfriend having her toes painted, pores cleaned and muscles massaged.

"I moved to Ireland two years ago, and I miss the spa," she says in the spa's dressing room. "In all the places I've been to in Europe, I still have to find one that is as friendly."

Haute Days and Haute Nights

by Joy Cherry

The swing has literally taken couture by storm. So, swing out sisters, in the zippy style of today's fashion.

There's a crazy new freedom in the air, and it's called Conservative Chic. After some heady times, we've suddenly woken up with the prospect of dancing to a whole new beat. And how do we react to that? You say you want change. I say let's begin with an inspiration like "necessity." And it's necessity that walks you in our front door.

The keynote of spring is renewal, and that's exactly what you'll find at Joy Cherry — literally and figuratively. The store's abloom with new arrivals as my European selections flood in amid the din of renovation.

Witness: our suits. Take those great '50's curves, add a dash of 60's freedom and you've got the fashion story for Spring '95. My current favourites: Féraud & Mugler's navy & white fine striped suits highlighted with crisp white collars and cuffs; Mila Schön, with her Italian influence and very clean shapes in fluid weightless materials, and our own "Great Good Buys" — our private label designs that run from $500 to $775. You'll find modern jackets in wonderful colours, some with brass buttons marching up the front.

The differences: lightweight fabric — a hint of flare in the skirt, peach colours . . . and leading the way, Escada, with their clear cool statement in sherbet colours.

There's no legislating fashion's whimsies. Ball gowns are back, with full skirts, lots of detail, wasp waists, corsets and waist cinchers. Suddenly, Versailles is much more than a nostalgic footnote.

Dressing up also means combining the unexpected: lace with lurex, a silk jacquard slip gown with chiffon tiered bottom, all handpainted in soft muted flowers. Chiffon tiered columns with matching illusion sheer coverups, handpainted in your colour choice.

As any belle of the ball can tell you, our gown selection is famous. We're told that if you can't find it at Joy's, you can't find it anywhere.

Everyone needs a touch of patent. The key to locking in the Spring '95 look is the "skinny belt" in shiny patent, pearl or rhinestone, even clear plastic — as long as it's narrow.

Our shoulder knapsacks with zipper & pocket details are a great accessories buy. Only $95, in shiny black, pink, white, red, beige, and yellow patent, they're a natural with the new strappy sandal or high-heeled Mary Janes in white, Europe's hottest shoe colour right now.

SPECIALLY DESIGNED FOR THE JOY CHERRY BRIDE. Our bridal show with Tiffany's was a smashing success; the reverberations can still be felt throughout Toronto and beyond. We've been overwhelmed with bridal appointments. The Vera Wang (exclusive to us) segment drew a standing ovation, as did the scene with the Phantom handing out roses to all our guests.

Our bridal philosophy has always been to avoid the ornate and re-interpret tradition in a very contemporary silhouette. Bridal designers like Vera Wang, Christos, and Scaasi, who reflect this philosophy, have turned pure silks, satins, organzas, tulles and taffetas into pure heaven. Carol Gold, our bridal consultant, will welcome you in our private salon. You can reach her at (416) 489-8809.

Speaking of weddings, have you seen the exhibit at Beth Tzedec? Grade 8 students did a project on marriage, creating their own ketubot using as reference the Cecil Roth collection. What a fabulous lesson for young people, to be challenged with the awareness of marriage vows in a positive, traditional context that underlines women's rights — a far different message than the media barrage of wife-abuse cases.

Want to meet a great chef who'se not afraid to reveal his cooking secrets? Drop in to La Cucina and ask for David. Try any of his salads — they're all wonderful! He's just south of us on Yonge Street. Just say "Joy sent me!"

Till next time, a few hot tips:

1. Join the Internet — the latest rendezvous for the ambitious, the young, and the married — all reported to be on line. It's better than a standup bar, and the dress code is flexible — though naturally we recommend that you shop at Joy Cherry beforehand just to be on the safe (and Conservative Chic) side.

2. Until I'm able to function on Vampire Time, I'm downloading to join the ITRW (In The Real World).

If you're going to hook up with the Internet, you'll want to equip yourself with the latest fashion vocabulary. Try these words on for size:

"Chicissimo" means something great in Milan, but Lagerfeld calls it "vulgar". His word is "exagerato". Oooo, that's vulgar. In Paris, something vulgar is "glauque". To Elle magazine, something great is "raging" or "death", while Details calls it "brilliant."

When I get back from New York, Paris and Milan, I hope to have a few terms of my own.

Have a chicissimo, exagerato, raging, brilliant spring — or at the very least, a romantic one.

Warmly,

Joy

TEE OFF

Now women can look good on the fairway

Golf! It's the fastest growing summer sport for women in Canada. Increasing numbers of women are now teeing off, often combining business and pleasure. In 1994, there were 95,000 women golfers, according to the Canadian Ladies Golf Club Association.

But until now, golfing fashions have been scarce, with women being forced to wear old-fashioned, often matronly prints and paisley outfits on the course.

The Casual Way, recognizing a growing need for comfortable and stylish golfwear for women, is introducing a style from California — Marcia — a fashionable golf fashion line.

"The stylishly different Marcia line offers women a collection of quality sportswear with a distinct modern accent," said Michele Kesten, owner of The Casual Way. "Women golf enthusiasts can now be in style both on the fairways and in the clubhouse."

The Marcia line is available in a myriad of styles, colors and designs. This comfortable line will feature regulation-length golf shorts, polo collar T-shirts, reversible jackets, warm-up tops and pants, as well as cardigans.

The mix and match fashions can be interchanged to create a polished but relaxed look both on the course or at post-game dinners and awards banquets.

To complement their look, women can choose from a large selection of caps and visors. The Marcia garment line is durable and easy to care for— all fabrics are washable.

The Casual Way is located at 2541 Yonge St. Appointments can be made for personal attention and wardrobe planning.

Some of the Marcia Line available at the Casual Way include Caribbean Brights (right) and the Linen Lurex (below).

Not just hot but sizzling. Romantic evenings at outdoor cafes, the warm breeze and trees blossoming all tell us that spring is in the air.

Sunlight is so wonderful it almost feels medicinal. When I awake to sunshine, I feel a sense of well being. However, it's time for us to start using a moisturizer with a 15 SPF to protect our skin from those harmful rays that feel so good.

Since your skin is most important to looking your best, you must take care of it and keep it looking young and fresh.

Makeup this spring will be subtle yet well defined. Pink, pink and more pink is definitely the way to go — totally fashion forward. Pink eye shadow, pink blush, pink lips everything is pink. Colors of pink will modulate from dark fuchsia to cotton candy.

It will be fun to have some color after the long bout of brown we have had.

Here are some tips to help you radiate through the spring months.

SKIN

One of the most fabulous experiences I've had in a long time came when I entered Dr. Sammy Sliwin's office at 1188-B Eglinton Ave. W.

Sliwin and his friendly staff greeted me and showed me into a beautifully appointed room where I was to have a Bio Medic MicroPeel beauty procedure — a gentle sloughing off of dry, dead cells on the skin's surface.

"Young skin constantly sheds its outer layer," explains Sliwin. "As one gets older, both from birthdays and from environmental damage, cells don't shed as efficiently. This marvelous new wave treatment smooths and brightens the skin, thus imparting a more youthful appearance."

20 minutes

I was thrilled with the way my skin looked. It felt like silk and appeared healthier.

The whole procedure took approximately 20 minutes. I was given a five-step home treatment program, which I've been using for a couple of weeks. I sincerely recommend the process, particularly at this time of the year as we come through the winter months.

HAIR

A return to the '20s is evident everywhere. Beautiful soft waves curled with hot rollers or a curling iron are in many cases not brushed, just falling softly around the face for a feminine look. Large-barrelled curling irons are now available to give your hair volume and bounce.

BODY/HAND

Even though there is extra moisture in the air, it is important to moisturize and to choose products that are not highly scented.

CHEEKS

Choose a color of blush that is in the rose or pink family. Dust it high on your cheekbones and blend with a soft sponge.

EYES

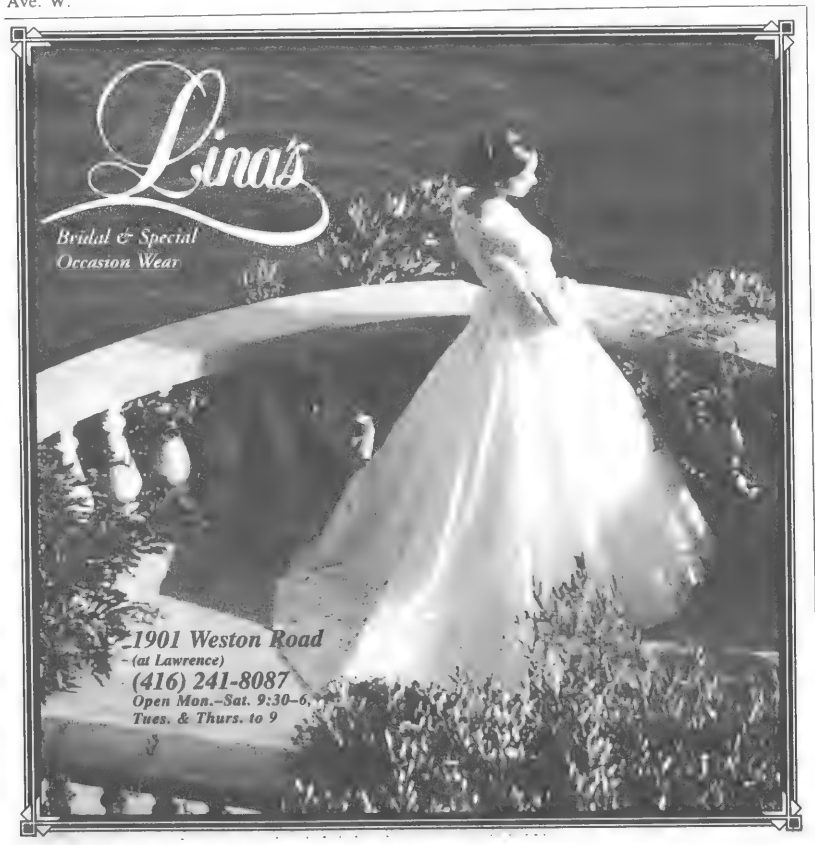
As you remove your heavy, warm clothing, lighten up on your eye makeup as well. Use soft pink tones on your eye lids, beige under your brows, grey or brown in the creases and, of course, lots of cream mascara.

LIPS

Exciting colors of pink will not only enhance your lips but will brighten your whole face. Outline your lips with a matching lip pencil to give extra definition.

BROWS

Brows should be well defined. Use a brow pencil or eye shadow. Be sure to brush brows with either a brow brush or a toothbrush. Brows are to your face, what a picture frame is to your favorite painting, so don't forget them.



Leg treatment without the pain

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

European Touch is the foremost full-service esthetic salon specializing in GHR, a painless method of permanent hair removal. French trained owner, Nadia Danay, brings 20 years of experience and her gentle touch to these treatments.

Danay is knowledgeable about skin and beauty care. She was first introduced to the GHR system of hair removal by a friend, when she found electrolysis unsatisfactory. Her initial reaction upon hearing of GHR was "no pain, no gain," yet she can personally attest to its effectiveness.

As Danay explains, "normally hair is a poor conductor of electricity." The GHR system works with a cream which is applied to the hair; this removes oil, making the hair a better conductor. A tweezer is then applied to the hair and galvanic currents travel from the GHR machine into the tweezer pulling the hair. When the current flows down to the hair follicle, a chemical reaction occurs, which results in lye, a corrosive substance which eats at the hair.

Over a number of treatments, the hair falls out. Since there are three stages of human hair growth — dormant, active, and present — some of the hair will return if not pulled in the active stage. With persistence though, the system can effectively remove all unwanted hair.

Unlike electrolysis, GHR is a completely non-invasive treatment so it poses no health risks and the skin around the affected area does not scar. It is so gentle that one can apply makeup after a GHR session.

Electrolysis is limited by the rigidity of the needle used. If a hair shaft is not straight, the follicle is not reached and the end result is a sharp burn on the skin. The GHR system, on the other hand, is considered a safe and permanent method of hair removal.

European Touch also provides facials, manicures, pedicures, lash and brow tinting and waxing. Bridal packages are available to pamper the bride during the hectic period leading up to the day of the wedding. Service packages and gift certificates are also available.

Nadia Danay

Danay is qualified to administer glycolic acid treatments for skin rejuvenation and acne removal. Her expertise and knowledge are so strong in this area that she trains and supervises those who are new to applying the treatment.

She emphasizes that glycolic acid treatments are not to be taken by those that have used retin-a or taken accutane, or are pregnant or breast feeding. Danay is careful to question people about their medical history before beginning.

Danay is establishing herself as a health aide to those preparing for, or who have just undergone, plastic surgery. With her care, clients are able to reduce swelling and scarring, and possibly recover faster. To book an appointment with Danay, call European Touch, at 416-224-0083.

A Joyful style

Femina by Debra Joy has created a unique environment for buying clothes. Rather than the traditional home shopping party on catalogue buying, a Femina consultant can come to the office, home or beauty salon and display the new pret-a-porter line.

The Femina line is designed by Canadian stylist (H.) Debra, who has discovered a need among women for a controlled, comfortable and private environment.

"People think they need to be Princess Diana and buy haute couture to receive up close and personal service. I've made a promise to myself that Femina by Debra Joy will let every one feel like Princess Di," she says.

Old styles from the '60s and '70s have become timeless. This ready to wear collection is perfect for women of any age. It is for women who don't like to fuss but want to stay contemporary in a simplified fashion. The Femina line consists of fabrics carefully chosen for durability and longevity.

For her Spring '95 pret-a-porter, Debra has chosen cotton, microfibre, cross dye crepe and novelty knits. All the fabrics used have lots of great texture. Styles consist of pencil pant coordinates with matching tops, vests and a very "now" trench coat. Each bottom is stylized with a "skinny belt" to complete the ensemble.

At the top of the '95 collection, Debra Joy is offering the Novelty Knit, a sure winner. Easy to wear and wash, the Novelty Knit can be worn to the office, out on the weekend, and when accessorized properly, out on the town.

Also new is the Cross Dye Crepe. Three lusciously rich colors include soft emerald, burnt coral and stone. With textured fabrics being the hit for spring, this group will be a hit, even with the most demanding of customers.

The next big number is the Rayon Flax. This style provides a highly sophisticated look, resembling a rich linen, but with easy washing care. The Rayon Flax goes great on its own; with the prints Debra has chosen, options abound.

Faceology treatments and Dead Sea Products

Two tips for looking good

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

The name Rich and Famous Faceology 2000 evokes a lifestyle. But one needs not be rich and famous to benefit from the treatments.

Owner Barbara Swierczynska can rejuvenate and enhance one's looks, often as a less drastic alternative to plastic surgery.

"Plastic surgery tightens skin, but does nothing with the muscles; things revert. We stimulate and strengthen the muscles," Swierczynska says.

A hand-held instrument stimulates underlying facial muscles while toning and pulling up sagging skin. This improves circulation, accelerates cell renewal and reduces wrinkles. The result is a fuller, more youthful face.

Collagen ampules are also used to replace some of the natural fluids lost to age. Swierczynska, a trained esthetician, says this method is not new; it has been used in Europe for years as a form of rehabilitation for people suffering muscle spasms or who have a partly paralyzed face.

Just as exercising one's body requires ongoing commitment and dedication, faceology treatments must be repeated over a period of time in order to have a satisfactory and lasting effect.

Swierczynska teaches facial exercises after the basic 10 sessions and emphasizes the importance of drinking a lot of water. The treatments, which are painless, are best when performed on the 35-60 age group. They cannot be done on anyone who has a pacemaker or facial implants.

As a secondary or alternate treatment to rejuvenate the skin, Swierczynska provides glycolic acid peel treatments. Glycolic acid is much gentler than other acid treatments, which may discolor or possibly scar the skin. Neostrate glycolic acid is an element found in sugar cane, which helps reproduce collagen naturally present under the skin.

The treatment removes the damaged layer of dead skin, allowing the undamaged skin underneath to rebuild and restructure. This creates the appearance of a healthier, tighter complexion. Glycolic acid peels are excellent for the relief of acne, age spots, photo damage and sun spots.

Swierczynska takes into account clients' age and the condition of their skin before administering any treatment. For more information, call Barbara at Rich and Famous Faceology 2000 416-323-1413.

Dead Sea minerals imported

For those that prefer at-home skincare treatments, an excellent line of products based on the mineral-rich mud and healing salt water of the Dead Sea is now being imported to Canada.

Mineral Spa Dead Sea Natural Skin Treatments are made with specially purified natural minerals and black muds with added botanical extracts. They incorporate unique, ion-free lotions and creams to help preserve the full activity of the Dead Sea mineral ions.

Produced by Alpa Cosmetics of Carmiel, a leading cosmetic company in Israel, they are imported by H.L.P. Enterprises. H.L.P. owner Book Yakobi became aware of the need for such a product line when, over a period of time travelling to Israel, he found himself bringing back more and more supplies of Dead Sea beauty products for the women in his family.

With 11 products, the line offers something to fit into every beauty regime. For daily use there are creams which condition and soften the skin. Deep cleaning is a pleasure with their facial cleansing milk and toner, and mud mask and scrub nourish as well as cleanse.

A line of products to complement the bath include bath salts which can transform an ordinary bath into a relaxing experience.

Mineral Spa Dead Sea products were formulated by Dr. Karl Laden, former president of the U.S. Society of Cosmetic Chemists. He developed the treatments over a period of three years, establishing the best possible products with his base ingredients.

Since Mineral Spa Dead Sea products contain botanics and herbs, any drying effect which may be caused by the salt naturally present is neutralized.

All extracts are prepared by cold process to preserve the activity of each ingredient. Soothing aloe vera is in the facial toner, mineral, mud and day cream, which also contains PABA, to protect against the aging effects of sunlight.

The products are not tested on animals and contain no animal products. The creams come in a unique jar which dispenses a small amount at a time, to prevent unwanted dirt or bacteria from contaminating the cream. The black mud and bath salts are packaged with concern for the environment, in burlap bags.

A 500-gram package of bath salts costs $24.99, and the mineral and mud beauty bar a mere $7.99. Mineral Spa Dead Sea Natural Skin Treatments can be found in some stores or ordered by mail through H.L.P. Enterprises. For more information phone 416-233-5537 or fax 416-233-8269.

Ellen Somer goes out on a limb for feet

By Sylvia Papernick
Special to the CJN

The paiper meche tree set outside of Our On A Limb is not only a reference to the socks and hosiery sold within but to the treatment provided by owner Ellen Somer.

Somer runs the Avenue Road shop with a stress on customer service and an excellent merchandise selection.

Hosiery, Somer said, is a great and inexpensive way to update a wardrobe. For instance a pair of bright tights can bring new life to a tired outfit.

Out On A Limb carries something for everyone, with hosiery to fit the whole family. Men's socks are available in dress, casual or athletic. Women's hosiery includes full lines of casual and trouser socks, pantyhose, stay-ups, knee-highs, tights and bodywear from such brand names as Danskin, Hue, Aelita, Ralph Lauren and Calvin Klein. Aerobic and walking socks have cushioned soles. Somer can meet most any need, she even carries support hose and maternity tights and pantyhose.

Her line of children's tights with names like Filoverde, Mondor or Franzone, is stylish and quality assured. Somer carries a full range of children's sizes from 0-6 months, to size 12-14. Tights are versatile depending on the level of stretch desired and are manufactured in microfibre, Lycra, cotton, cotton-and-nylon and wool-and-cotton-and-nylon.

Many of the imported names in pantyhose can be trusted for quality, style and fit. Filodoro from Italy has been available in Canada four years and offers a wonderful consistency of product. Philippe Matignon, Franzone Ergee and Dim are priced at a reasonable $4.95 and up.

The European lines tend to be more generous with their sizing. Ergee comes in five sizes rather than the standard three, a blessing for those hard to fit.

For spring, the over-the-knee sock is very popular, available in many textures, especially the nostalgic fishnet and micro-fishnet.

Of course Out On A Limb also carries an extensive selection of socks in a wide array of textures, colors and brands such as Hue, Hot Sox, Weekender, and their own 100 per cent cotton label. Hot colors for spring should be banana, kiwi, pimento, aqua and bright fuchsia. Pantyhose will echo these shades in softer colors.

Somer keeps a file on customers so she can notify them when a new item comes in or to give them advance notice of a sale. She will take special orders without a deposit and will take back merchandise for exchange, even pantyhose that don't fit. Gift certificates are available.

Since her store opened last August customer feedback has been excellent. "It's been really positive," she said, the general feeling being a store like this was needed in the area.

Out On A Limb is warm and homey in decor with lots of room at the front for strollers. Even the packaging is unique, with every purchase wrapped in a paper bag, tissue and ribbon. People react to it the same way they have to the store, Somer adds. "Everybody comments on it, it's really something special."

Out On A Limb is located at 1845 Avenue Rd, south of Hwy.401.

Comfort is a priority with Mister Leonard's collection

Warm-weather jackets, long flowing skirts and pants, loose and easy walking shorts, sporty T-shirts.

The story for Spring '95 at Mister Leonard is comfort first. One of Canada's premier manufacturer of affordable, fine fashions for women is set to unveil an outstanding collection of fashion essentials that fit the bill.

Mister Leonard's three beautiful fashion collections emphasize versatility, flexibility and individual expression. The Mister Leonard Collection features suits for career dressing; Leonard Studio offers free flowing dressing for day and evening; and Leonard Sport relaxes with casual fashions for the weekend. They deliver a sensational range of fashion-forward choices for women of all ages and lifestyles.

"We designed our Mister Leonard spring-summer collections to provide realistic fashion solutions for today's busy women," says Lorne Gertner, president of Mister Leonard Inc. "The soft lines and rich textures of our coordinating collections make it easy for women to pull together stylish outfits for every occasion."

Mister Leonard Collection

The designers of Mister Leonard Collection recognize that many women spend a large part of their day at the office. So all-day comfort is a key priority in its exciting range of mix and match embroidered short-sleeved shirts and sleeveless tops, walking shorts, ankle and knee length skirts and long fitted jackets in lightweight gauze, crepe and silk.

The collection develops four exciting themes. Cafe Pales is eye-pleasing in soft green or vanilla scalloped lily crepe jacquard prints; Modern Approach combines structure and sophistication with stylish career coordinates in soft florals and prints; Treasure Isle combines royal blue and brown for a European mood; and Innovative Images lends a tropical feel with light and airy gauze in melon, purple and bronze tones.

Belted, loose, short-sleeved or long, Mister Leonard Collection's warm-weather jackets are easy, relaxed and modern. A single-button melon-colored long jacket with gathered back elastic looks elegant with a flowing long georgette skirt. For day, a short-sleeved, side slit blouse doubles as a jacket.

For skirts any length goes. They're either long and flowing or short and flared. Ankle-length skirts in modern and retro floral prints, leafy designs and paisley prints create a romantic feminine feeling. Add some texture with waffled rayon/cotton blends or light and airy gauze. Take a short cut. A super short 20-inch floral flip skirt looks best with a little knit sweater.

Treasure Isle separates combine royal blue and brown for a European mood.

When temperatures heat up, comfortable walking shorts make an easy choice. Team them up with an embroidered blouse for the office or a beaded T-shirt on the weekend.

Leonard Studio

Who has time for wardrobe changes between work and a night on the town? Leonard Studio's collection of comfortable, relaxed jackets, flowing pants and embroidered shirts and blouses go equally well from work to play.

Leonard Studio presents three groupings: Ethnic Elements comes in black, cinammon and paprika, solids, prints and diagonal striped crinkle linen; Natural Harmony, has fun with sporty embroidered T-shirts, and casual laundered linen and cotton poplin jackets; and Bold Contrasts for the hot summer months goes dramatic in black and white solids, abstracts, circles and stripes.

Leonard Studio's wardrobe basics include classic black jeans with top-stitching, fringed patterned sweaters and crinkled linen shirts. The canvas anorak is a must have on chilly nights and a tie-back duster with front buttons is a safe bet when you just don't know what to wear. Wear it with pants or a long skirt and you're ready to go anywhere.

Pants are hot. Tapered or wide legged, there's a pair of pants for every occasion. Poplin pyjama-styles look great with a pointelle cotton T-shirt and loose five-button jacket. Washable linen pleated pants are a relaxing choice when teamed with a striped shirt over a tone-on-tone embroidered T-shirt. Pleated pants, with elastic waist inserts, are a comfortable option.

Leonard Sport

Leonard Sport is for weekend relaxing. The collection has just the right fashion stuff — from jersey knit tanks and vests to drawstring skirts and dependable denims — to kick back in style.

Mix and match Leonard Sport's three chic collections: Variety Mix is a cool choice in denim blues and khaki; Cote D'Azur features knit and cotton casual wear; and Summer Softwear beats the heat with cotton crinkle gauze with button embroidery and lace pocket details in refreshing shades of melon, steel blue and white.

Head to the country in denim blues or combat khaki. Team a long denim A-line skirt with a pointelle knit vest and hit the trails. For evening, a denim blazer shirt with cuffed sleeves is a natural choice.

Wide-leg pants worn with an abstract patterned cotton sweater look great with a twill drawstring jacket. Have fun with a brightly colored vest over matching geometrical embroidered and applique T-shirts. Drawstring jackets and pants in cotton/rayon "lacoste-style" knitwear are an easy choice for the weekend, while cotton twill shorts and jeans combine fashion and function in leaf green, sea blue, lemon yellow and tangy tangerine.

Spring at Mister Leonard features all the essential pieces you need to refresh and renew your wardrobe. Its three affordable fashion-forward collections deliver a sensational range of fun, versatile, high quality separates that can be mixed and matched for any occasion.

Natural Harmony features a linen appliqué sweater with green cotton poplin pants.

Ethiopian teen rises to the top

World Zionist Press Service

With the arrival of Soviet immigrants in Israel in the early 1990s, blonde, blue-eyed models began to appear for the first time in magazine and newspaper advertisements and on the country's catwalks.

Then Ethiopians joined the ranks of Israel's growing cadre of immigrant models.

One is 17-year-old Fanny Tasama. A three-year trek by horse and donkey across North African deserts brought her to Israel in 1984 with Operation Moses.

Now, all eyes turn as the dark-skinned, fair-haired beauty strides confidently through the Ashdod shopping mall. Everybody in this rapidly-expanding port town has heard of Tasama, who looks poised to conquer the magazine covers and catwalks of the fashion world.

Striking features

Her striking features have already adorned every local publication, several national newspapers and Israel's largest circulation women's magazine La'Isha.

"Some people say I bear a resemblance to [super model] Naomi Campbell," she notes with a chuckle. "But there's only me."

Despite appearances, Tasama's road to success has been anything but easy. She was six when her family left home for the trek across the deserts to Sudan to be airlifted to Israel. Her older sister died en route and Fantisha — she later changed her name to Pnina, then Fanny — became the second oldest of six surviving daughters.

Her father had asthma and could not work, and the family was forced to survive on the meagre salary her mother earned in a factory.

"I've succeeded in getting where I am by redefining myself as an Israeli," says Tasama with a self-assured air. "I've made myself become accepted and never suffered from any discrimination during those difficult early-teenage years.

"Ethiopians have yet to learn how to push for what is rightfully theirs. They accept whatever they are offered with a meek thank-you. That's why they've yet to advance into Israeli society. What the Ethiopian immigrant community needs is its first Israeli celebrity. I'll be happy to become the community's first household name.

"I dream of modeling abroad as an Ethiopian Israeli. I'm proud of my background. But as long as Ethiopian immigrants maintain the mentality of newcomers, they will always remain outsiders."

Tasama, who regularly parties at Tel Aviv hotspots, lives in Moshav Sde Uziah near Ashdod with her 29-year-old boyfriend Avi Hasan, whom she met while modeling lingerie at the Tel Aviv Hilton.

"Even though I no longer live the lifestyle of an Ethiopian immigrant, I'm close to my family and look forward to visiting them at weekends," says Tasama, who admits she rejected the internal family hierarchy.

She does, however, remain loyal to her parents and deeply respects their wishes. "I'll never appear in the nude or in risque poses, it would hurt my mother. But I love to dance and I always steal the show. If others cannot reconcile with my lifestyle — that's their problem."

Tasama has so far resisted approaches from local modeling agencies. "I'm a little confused regarding my future. The prospect of being tied down to a contract scares me, and I have military service in a year to think about."

In the meantime she serves as her own agent, appearing regularly in local fashion shows. Her self-assertive individuality has brought her a long way. Now the leap into national — maybe international — fame beckons.

Alfred Sung launched his Spring 95 Bridal Collection recently with a show at Ritché Couture. Amongst the many new styles are: (left) this simple chiffon wedding gown with flower detail; (centre) silk wedding gowns with embroidered bodices with poet sleeves and scoop neckline (l) and peplum waist with V-back (r); (right) a full tulle skirt, bodice in peau de soie with Austrian crystals adorning the neckline and scattered throughout.

If you don't think you can have better skin, call us for a second opinion.

Everyone has better skin than they think they do. You can spend a lifetime trying to correct the appearance of your skin by covering it up. But modern technology has discovered the healthiest, most effective way to better skin is to "uncover" it.

Today that way is the MicroPeel. It's "the new peel."

This 3-step, twenty minute procedure gently, safely, effectively and painlessly rids the skin of its damaged, micro-thin top layer. And unlike the traditional, deep chemical peels, the MicroPeel can show improvement immediately.

Alfred Sung's Spring Bridal Collection 1995

On Feb. 22, Ritche Couture was filled with people who came to see the 1995 Alfred Sung Spring Bridal Collection and meet the renowned Canadian designer in person.

A crowd of almost 200 enjoyed the informal fashion show of 30 exquisite styles being modeled throughout the three levels of the Ritche Avenue Road store.

"I love beauty and what is more beautiful to see than a woman on her wedding day?" Sung asks. "There's such liberty and scope in creating for such a special occasion. I can be either subtle or grand in design, lavish in fabric selection and use, and indulgent in details and ornamentation."

Sung's name is synonymous with elegant, understated classic style. His refined styling is evident in sculpted bodices, graceful necklines, and dramatic off-the-shoulder and strapless looks, which are complemented by striking, contoured sleeves and flattering, accentuated waistlines.

His floating skirts rustle from multiple yards of the finest Thai silk, silk essence chiffons, lustrous satins, and shimmering organzas.

Their workmanship and finishing details include ultra-fine French seams, ribbon-bound hems, curled hemlines, pearl edging, Swarovski Austrian crystal accents, and tiny loop and covered button closures.

Widows were married on Thursdays

Strange but true: Jewish nuptial customs

By JANET SILVER GHENT

Throughout history, Jewish tradition has celebrated marriage with special customs. Some are holy, some hilarious.

Although the Bible itself says little about the marriage ceremony itself, the Encyclopedia Judaica provides interesting information on Jewish nuptial traditions from the talmudic period to modern times. Here are a few highlights, some still practised today:

Even in the talmudic era, weddings were celebrated with dancing, dining and a little drinking. And occasionally, revelries turned a bit raucous. One rabbi, Rav Acha, reportedly shocked his rabbinical colleagues by dancing with the bride on his shoulders.

And some medieval commentators said the custom of shattering the glass was designed to inject a note of sobriety into such "unseemly hilarity."

Virgins got the full ceremonial treatment in talmudic times, with a larger ketubah (marriage contract), a grand procession with a hen and rooster at the helm, a goblet of wine, and various games.

Weddings took place on Wednesdays. If the groom decided the bride was not a virgin, he was expected to go before the court, which met on Thursdays, and try to get his marriage annulled.

Widows were married on Thursdays, giving the couple three full days to celebrate their nuptials.

Today many Orthodox Jewish nuptials include a week of celebrations.

During the talmudic period, marriage ceremonies had two parts. The kiddushin, or betrothal, included benedictions and the giving of the ring. But the couple was not permitted to live together until the chupah (canopy) ceremony. With virgins, a one-year interval between the two ceremonies was typical. During medieval times, the two ceremonies were combined.

Bride fed seven times

Throughout Jewish history, communities across the globe developed their own wedding customs. In Eastern Europe, the bride and groom would step on their new partner's foot at the end of the ceremony. The winner of the stomping match supposedly got to dominate the marriage.

In some Oriental Jewish communities, a special ceremony took place the night before the wedding. Only women were invited. The bride's hands were painted with red henna to ward off the evil eye, and the bride was fed seven times during the course of the evening.

The Encyclopedia Judaica notes other customs unique to the Jews of Salonika. During the wedding festivities, the groom would place live fish in a brass bowl filled with water. On the eighth day after the wedding, the bride would jump over the bowl three times and the guests would recite the blessing "May you be as fertile as the fish." When the bride entered her new home, the groom would stand at the head of the stairs, scattering sweetmeats, rice and coins.

During the Libyan ceremonies, the groom would shatter a glass filled with wine, spilling it as a sign of plenty. In the Libyan mountains, most weddings occurred two days after Sukkot. On the second festival day, the grooms participated in a foot race, recalling the verse from Psalm 19: "And he is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber and rejoiceth as a strong man to run his course." On the Shabbat after the wedding, the groom was honored at the synagogue.

In Tunisia, the groom was invited to the bride's home on the Sabbath preceding the wedding. Prior to his arrival, a roast chicken was hidden and he had to find it. Five days after the wedding, the bride and groom held a competition, with each dissecting a cooked fish for serving. The groom usually lost, because he got a blunt knife.

Lundstrom's Resort Collection

This long purple voile chemise, Sultan's pant and tasseled sash, gold "Dr. No" maillot (beneath chemise), travel wallet and slip-on shoes are all part of Linda Lundstrom's exciting new creations including a new line of swimwear for women who have had breast cancer surgery. Lundstrom draws on her own experiences when designing. With a history of melanoma in her family, she is now concerned about protecting herself from the sun. "That's why I began designing clothing especially to help protect the wearer from the sun." The light fabric used in her Resort line prevents 80 per cent of UVA, UVB and UVC rays from reaching the skin. It's also crushable and a week's worth fits in one carry-on bag.

of Blessed Memory

Nissan 11, 5662—Tammuz 3, 5754

April 18, 1902—June 12, 1994

The Rebbe

Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the seventh leader of the Chabad Lubavitch dynasty was universally known as "the Rebbe". As a result of his dynamic stewardship at the head of the Lubavitch movement for forty-four years, he has been recognized as the one individual responsible for stirring the conscience and spiritual awakening of world Jewry.

The Rebbe was born in 1902, on the 11th day of Nissan, in Nikolaev, Russia. At the age of five he moved with his parents to the Ukranian city of Yekatrinislav, where his father was appointed Chief Rabbi. From early childhood the Rebbe displayed a prodigious mental acuity and advanced rapidly in his studies. His diligence and sharp mind was evident from his scholarly correspondences with some of the leading Rabbis of Europe. In 1929 he married Chaya Moussia, the second daughter of Rabbi Yosef Yitzchok Schneerson the sixth Rebbe of Lubavitch.

Upon his arrival in the United States in 1941 he was appointed to head the educational and social agencies of Lubavitch, as well as the newly formed publication society.

In 1950, after the passing of his father-in-law, who had the arduous task of transplanting the Chassidic court to the U.S.A., Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson ascended to the leadership of the sprouting movement.

His total dedication and concern to reach every Jew was evident by the network of underground institutions established in the Soviet Union, outreach stations from Kiryat Shemona to Be'er Sheva, and Chabad Houses throughout the world. Today there are more than two thousand institutions which were established as a result of the Rebbe's inspiration.

For over four decades the Rebbe's plan unfolded dramatically. No sector of the community was neglected. From day schools and summer camps, to social services for seniors, every segment of the community was included. These projects shared a common objective to heighten an awareness, appreciation and participation in Jewish life.

He expounded the belief that every Jew, indeed every human being, has a unique role to play in the greater scheme of things and is an integral part of the tapestry of G-d's creation. He had an uncanny ability to meet everyone at their own level, from heads of state to small children. His inspiration boosted the individual's self perception and brought to light the hidden wealth of talent within each individual.

As a teacher he conducted countless Farbrengens (Chassidic gatherings) which brought together Chassidim from all over the world and others who were attracted by his warmth and enthusiasm. It was not uncommon to see college students and businessmen sitting along-side Rabbis with greying beards. During the course of a Farbrengen, the Rebbe would explore intricate Talmudic subjects and also find time to address pertinent issues affecting Jewish life. Often the Rebbe's message was beamed via satellite to Chabad Centres around the world. More than 200 volumes of his talks, writings and correspondences have been published to date. His teachings have been translated into many languages including English, French, Spanish, Russian and Italian.

During the course of the Rebbe's 92 years he generated a constant flow of optimism, strength and instruction that continues to inspire world Jewry even after his passing. He taught us that we can do better, that we can bring redemption and rid the world of war, hate and ignorance. "That time is now", declared the Rebbe "we stand poised on the threshold of the promised Redemption, Moshiach is about to come." The ultimate era of peace, harmony and tranquility is imminent. He encouraged us to prepare for Moshiach's arrival through Torah, Mitzvot and acts of goodness and kindness. Let's do it!

Be a Part of It!

The entire Jewish community is invited to take part in the writing of a Sefer Torah dedicated to the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson of Blessed Memory. All his endeavours shared a common objective to unite Jews from all walks of life. Notwithstanding diverse backgrounds, assorted views and varied affiliation, the Rebbe laboured arduously to unite Klal Yisroel, no one was excluded nor forgotten.

Thus as a fitting tribute to the Rebbe, a communal Torah with the participation of the entire Toronto Jewish community is now being written. We invite you to participate in this Mitzvah by acquiring words in this Sefer Torah for yourself and entire family. You may also commemorate the departed, by dedicating words in their memory.

Now more than ever, when Klal Yisroel is experiencing difficult challenges, we must strengthen Achdut—Unity. Our Sages have taught that the verse, "G-d will give us strength, G-d will bless his Nation with peace," refers to Torah. So too it is our prayerful wish that our collective efforts will bring peace and harmony in the fullest measure and hasten the arrival of Moshiach.

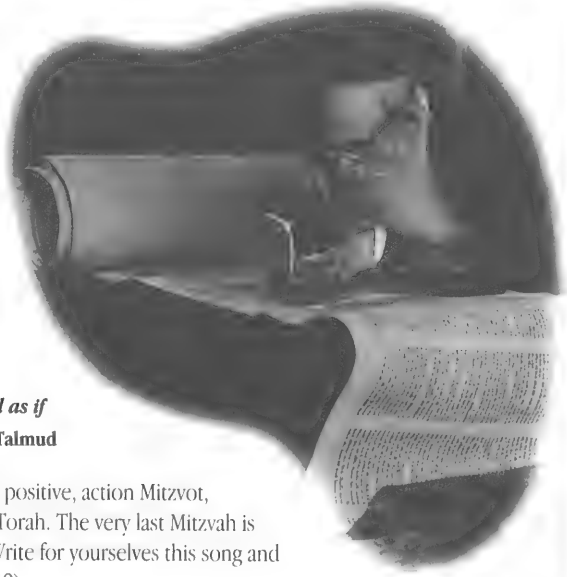
The Last Mitzvah



"He who writes his own Torah can be considered as if he received it at Mount Sinai."
Talmud

The 613 Mitzvot which are comprised of 248 positive, action Mitzvot, and 365 prohibitions all find their origin in the Torah. The very last Mitzvah is the Divine imperative to write a Torah scroll, "Write for yourselves this song and teach it unto your children" (Deuteronomy 31:19).

Commentaries note that even one who inherited a scroll is obligated to write his own, since this endeavour would further sensitize him to its significance and importance. Yet, one who is unqualified to write the biblical script in accordance with Halachic specifications, may delegate this responsibility to an expert who will write it on his behalf. Thus, throughout the ages people with a special sensitivity have elected to commission a pious scribe to write a Torah on their behalf. It is usually entrusted to a Shul or Yeshiva where it is read regularly.

Often when a new Torah is being written, the community at large is invited to participate by purchasing letters and words. Our Sages have ruled that through this practice one can fulfill the Mitzvah of writing a Sefer Torah. It is also customary to include loved ones who have departed, as an eternal commemoration.

It is our prayerful wish that our endeavours in fulfillment of the last Mitzvah of the Torah will bring about the conclusion of the Galut so we may witness, without delay, the arrival of Moshiach.

The Torah Scroll

It is the most precious article in Jewish life. In times of need, prayers are offered in its presence. It is perfectly intact just as we received it some 3300 years ago. In fact any deviation or even an imperfection would deem it unfit. It is the sacred Torah scroll.

In accordance with tradition, the first presentation was shown to Moshe by G-d, "written in black fire over white fire," with all its demarcations. Moshe transcribed from that fiery Torah, while G-d verbally dictated the words. This very first Torah was awarded to the Levites. So too, each of the twelve tribes were gifted a Torah scroll.

From these original scrolls, additional Torahs were transcribed, in precise detail, so that not only the words were recorded correctly but also the letters were identical in appearance. In fact, even the spacing between paragraphs and chapters were painstakenly duplicated, for indeed each and every feature was prescribed by G-d.

During the course of history, in spite of dispersion, hardship and human error every effort was made to maintain these exacting standards. Thus, Maimonides in his classic code of law describes how he laboured assiduously to write a Torah scroll cloned with exacting precision to the scroll of "Ben Asher" of Tiberias, whose Torah scroll was known to be perfected and widely accepted as a result of his painstaking efforts.

The Torah which begins with the word Braishis and ends with the word Yisroel constitutes the "Written Torah", while its details, allusions, depth and extension form the all inclusive "Oral Torah."

The Torah scroll from beginning to end, forms one entity, thus should even one letter fade or become defective, the entire Torah scroll is unfit for use, until it is repaired.

Our sages have taught that each and every Jew has a letter in the Torah which corresponds to his soul and his spiritual identity. Furthermore just as each and every letter is an essential part of the Torah, so too, each and every Jew is of utmost importance and constitutes an integral part of Klal Yisroel.

Syrian peace not imminent: IDF

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel and Syria are unlikely to reach a peace agreement this year, says the head of the intelligence branch of the Israel Defence Force (IDF).

Maj.-Gen. Uri Saguy made the prediction during a six-hour cabinet briefing last Sunday devoted to the IDF's annual assessment of the country's security.

Although Syria is maintaining its general commitment to peace, Syrian President Hafez al-Assad is demanding terms that Israel cannot accept, Saguy told ministers.

Saguy said there are no signs Syria is willing to compromise on its insistence that Israel totally withdraw from the Golan Heights.

Saguy's report came as U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher was preparing to head to the region to help jumpstart the stalled talks. Christopher is due to arrive in Israel this Thursday.

In assessing Israel's overall security situation, Saguy said there's little chance that Israel will be involved in a war this year.

However, some ministers drew different conclusions from the report.

"I did not get the impression that Assad is under pressure to reach an accord. Therefore, I am not optimistic about the coming months with regard to peace talks with Syria," said Agriculture Minister Ya'acov Tsur.

Congress brief annoys sovereignty commission

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Members of the federalist coalition of Jewish, Greek and Italian communities got a relatively polite hearing when they presented their brief to the Montreal sovereignty commisson last week.

But they also had to handle some acerbic questioning from commission chair Marcel Masse and member Camille Laurin, who did not take kindly to accusations that the process is biased and disputed the coalition's right to say it speaks for 400,000 Quebecers.

The brief also said the referendum question should be, "Do you want Quebec to separate from the rest of Canada?"

Max Bernard, community relations chair for the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, said in an interview with The CJN that the presentation went "about as well as expected.

The rescue of Syrian Jewry

'We were buying Jews'

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Judy Feld Carr folds herself into an easy chair in her paper-crammed study, a changed woman, completely comfortable with what she's about to say — something she wouldn't have dared even whisper just a year ago:

"We were buying Jews," she notes matter-of-factly. "And we bribed people at the highest levels of the Syrian administration. We paid between $2,000 and $15,000 (US) per person; more for young, attractive women. Everybody in the Syrian Jewish community knew there were two ways out: either you escaped or you paid."

The untold story

There. She said it.

And now that the long, often agonizing exodus of Syria's Jewish community is all but over, the publicity-shunning Carr can finally open up and reveal how, over the past 23 years, she fought, cajoled, battled and bribed her way into and out of a clandestine campaign that was first dismissed by much of world Jewry as nearly impossible.

Former Chief Rabbi of Syria Avraham Hamra and Judy Feld Carr

Dubbed by the Israeli press as "the mother of Syrian Jews," the driving force behind the relief and rescue of Syrian Jewry can also say something she's been looking forward to for years: this Saturday's Shabbat Zachor, the annual Sabbath when Jews recall the biblical perfidy of Amalek, will be the last dedicated to the rescue of the Syrian community, as has been the case since 1975.

Carr will be guest speaker at the Beth Tzedec Congregation service, where her talk is titled The Rescue of Syrian Jewry — the Untold Inside Story. No doubt there's a good cloak-and-dagger tale in there somewhere. Joining her will be Itzak Shelef, Israel's ambassador to Canada, and Francois LaRochelle, Canada's former consul general in Damascus.

Despite her new openness and a demeanor that suggests a lot of weight has been taken off her shoulders, Carr still plays her cards close to her chest. She won't go on the record about everything that's happened since 1972, the year she became involved with the Jews of Syria and their bitter plight.

Harold Seigel Honored

TORONTO — Geophysicist Harold Seigel was recently inducted into the Canadian Mining Hall of Fame in recognition of his pioneering new methods of mining exploration.

Seigel is best known for his line of geophysical instruments marketed under the Scintrex label, a company he founded in 1967.

Over the years, he has been granted 21 patents in six countries, all on developments in mineral exploration technology.

Kerzners Named to JTS

NEW YORK — Joseph Kerzner, a longtime Toronto Jewish community activist, was recently elected to the board of directors of the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), marking the first time in the institution's 108-year history that a Canadian has served on its board.

In a separate development, Michael Kerzner, Joseph Kerzner's nephew, was named to the newly-established board of overseers of JTS's rabbinical school. He is the first Canadian on the 35-member board.

ISRAEL

Aliyah Totals

JERUSALEM — A total of 79,800 new immigrants arrived in Israel in 1994, the country's central bureau of statistics has reported.

That's 2,000 more than came in 1993.

Of last year's total, 68,000 came from the former Soviet Union, 4,500 from Europe and 3,600 from the United States.

Other figures released last week show that 8,579 newcomers came in the first two months of this year.

The total number of olim since December 1989, when the first wave began, now stands at 615,722.

Two New Ministers

JERUSALEM — Two Labor ministers started their new posts at the Interior and Religious Affairs ministries last Tuesday.

The Knesset earlier approved the cabinet appointments of Tourism Minister Uzi Baram to head the Interior Ministry, and Economics and Social Development Minister Shimon Shetreet to head the Religious Affairs Ministry.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin had been holding the two portfolios, in addition to serving as defence minister.

Rabin Rejects Proposal

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week rejected a request by Peace Now to dismantle 26 Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

The Peace Now proposal called for the evacuation of 26 of the smallest and most strategically problematic Israeli settlements. The proposal would have affected about 7,000 of the more than 100,000 settlers living in the West Bank.

The group said the settlements had to be evacuated in order for Palestinian self-rule to be extended to West Bank areas.

Rabin reportedly told the group he did not support a Palestinian state, but would agree to a Palestinian entity alongside Israel.

Jew Stabs Arab

JERUSALEM — A 19-year-old Arab resident of eastern Jerusalem was listed in serious condition last week after being stabbed in the back by a Jewish man in the Old City.

A border police patrol later apprehended the attacker, a 24-year-old unemployed resident of Netanya. The man has a criminal background, and told police he did not know the victim.

Lithuania Apologizes

JERUSALEM — The president of Lithuania offered a public apology to the Jewish people for the mass murder of Lithuania's Jews by his country's citizens during World War II.

Addressing the Knesset last Wednesday, the second day of a state visit, Algirdas Brazauskas sought forgiveness for the role his people played in the murder of more than 200,000 Lithuanian Jews.

Several Lithuanian survivors were present during the speech. One of them, former Knesset member Gustav Badyan, was overcome by emotion and was taken to the hospital with chest pains, Israel Television said.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told the Knesset that Israel would hold Brazauskas to his pledge to repeal a blanket pardon given to Nazi criminals in 1991, when Lithuania became independent.

City Unearthed

HAIFA — A Byzantine city with at least two churches has been uncovered here during excavations on the approaches to the Carmel Tunnel.

The Israel Antiquities Authority reported last week that the remains of the city include residential areas, cisterns, oil and wine presses and mosaic floors.

Jews Donate Ambulance

QUITO, Ecuador — This city's Jewish community, estimated at 1,000, has announced it will donate an ambulance to be used at Ecuador's border with Peru, where bloody clashes between the two countries broke out in January.

The ambulance will be sent to a hospital in Gualaquiza, a border town.

Muslim March Condemned

JOHANNESBURG — Muslim fundamentalists, chanting "Kill the Jews" and "Death to America," marched to the Israeli embassy in Cape Town last week to protest the killing of Muslims in various parts of the world, including "Palestine" and Bosnia.

Outside the embassy, Israeli and U.S. flags were smeared with red paint and then set on fire.

The South African Jewish Board of Deputies condemned "in the strongest terms" the "racial hatred and intolerance" expressed in the Muslims' chants, especially "Kill the Jews."

Sovereigntists rebuked over remarks

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec regions of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights and Canadian Jewish Congress were glad to see Bloc Quebecois leader Lucien Bouchard react to inflammatory remarks made Feb. 26 by Bloc MP Philippe Pare and Pierre Bourgault, former advisor to Quebec premier Jacques Parizeau.

B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights in Quebec and the constitutional coalition of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region and the Greek and Italian communities expressed outrage over Pare's comment that immigrants should step aside and let "pure wool" Quebecers decide Quebec's fate.

Bourgault, who resigned as advisor to Parizeau several weeks ago after saying a "dangerous" situation would result if the referendum loses depite a majority francophone vote, spoke at a Bloc meeting and described massive 97 per cent anglophone opposition to sovereignty as "racist."

The coalition called Pare's remarks inflammatory and accused Bourgault of "directly attacking the political and social fabric on which our society is based."

B'nai Brith charged that the two men's remarks "represent the scapegoating approach that so often characterizes narrow nationalist movements."

Bouchard denounced Bourgault's comments and ousted Pare, who later retracted his remarks, from a Bloc-Parti Quebecois committee on referendum strategy.

But Max Bernard, chair of Congress' community relations committee, suggested that Bouchard did not go far enough, since the coalition had also demanded Pare's dismissal from the Bloc caucus.

Bouchard's rebuke "is a good start," Bernard said. "But it would have been better if the audience [where Bourgeault spoke] had booed instead of clapped.

Lucien Bouchard

'That's the price you pay when stupid things are said'

"[Bouchard] said nothing to denounce the statements when they were made."

Bernard said Bouchard should also have called for Pare's resignation.

If that threatened the Bloc's Opposition party status, "that's the price you pay when stupid things are said," Bernard said.

Prof. Stephen Scheinberg, the League's national vice-president, praised Bouchard for "acting quickly" and termed his reaction to both men's remarks, "excellent."

Scheinberg believes Bouchard could not realistically be expected to dismiss Pare from the Bloc caucus because the party would risk losing its Opposition party status.

He said Bouchard reacted "vigorously," and demonstrated that such comments are "unacceptable."

Secretary of State for Multiculturalism Sheila Finestone said in a statement that the two men should clarify their comments. "Canada's diversity is recognized around the world. It is a richness that is reflected in our cultural, ethnic and regional pluralism."

Lawrence Bergman, Liberal MNA for D'Arcy McGee, accused Bourgeault of seeking to alter the debate in the wake of "meager results" obtained by the sovereignty commissions.

"Incapable of demonstrating to Quebecers the advantages of Quebec separating from Canada, he is now attempting to divide the people of Quebec," Bergman said in a statement.

New Maccabi chair sets out priorities

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Raising the level of sports talent, bringing in desperately-needed dollars and spreading the Maccabi message to more countries are the priorities of the Maccabi World Union's (MWU) new chair as it counts down to the Maccabiah Games in Israel in 1997.

But in listing his agenda, Uzi Netanel, who succeeded Michael Kevehazi last year, also seemed to acknowledge that the MWU — the Maccabi movement's governing body — has not completely had its act together in recent years.

Despite its growth in countries like Turkey, Eastern Europe and the C.I.S. and its status as the "strongest and biggest" Jewish organization spread over 60 countries, funds have been scarce and the calibre of athletic talent has declined over the last decade, he said.

"It's a big organization, but there is only a small leadership in Israel," Netanel said. "We need more people, more leaders. This is an international, not [just] an Israeli, organization."

Countries like France, he said, need more involvement.

The United States has previously used Maccabi "sports committees" to get ready for the "Jewish Olympics" but has had no bona fide organization.

Only now are they planning to establish Maccabi USA, modelled on Maccabi Canada.

Netanel, speaking to a group of Maccabi Canada officials and athletes recently, said it was a "stupid mistake" on his part not to have exposed himself to the Canadian operation earlier.

Canada has its own fundraising difficulties with which to contend. But Netanel portrayed Maccabi Canada as unique within the MWU in terms of its structure, commitment and spirit to the Maccabi cause.

Netanel envisioned more international cooperation among MWU nations, such as Canada and the United States working together and helping coordinate other nations' efforts.

Anti-Semitic incidents reported up in 1994

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The number of anti-Semitic incidents reported in Canada last year grew to 290, a 12 per cent jump over 1993 and the highest number yet recorded in 13 years of annual audits by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

Toronto bore the brunt for the largest number of incidents of harassment and vandalism, registering 50.3 per cent (146) of Canadian anti-Semitic incidents, according to the League's audit.

Montreal reported 54 incidents, about the same as the year before, while Ottawa registered a 16 per cent drop from 43 to 36. Winnipeg reported 15 incidents in 1994, no change from the previous two years, although just last week, the city's only Jewish high school, Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, was daubed with swastikas and slogans. The incident took place the morning after a television documentary on the racist right in Canada was aired.

Other areas of Canada, including British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Maritimes, reported fewer incidents against Jews in 1994.

The League found that Ontario outside Toronto and Ottawa experienced a 40 per cent rise in incidents. The League attributed that to "increased hate propaganda distribution in smaller communities ... However, total reports of vandalism in regional Ontario declined by one-third, perhaps because of the greater vigilance in the cities and the creation of [police] hate crimes units."

In compiling the statistics, the League relied on voluntary reports to B'nai Brith offices and lodges, as well as to the police, school officials and the media, said Karen Mock, national director of the League. These probably represent "only a fraction of actual occurrences," she said.

Karen Mock

Incidents fell into two categories: vandalism, defined by acts of physical damage to property, and harassment, which includes hate propaganda, hate mail, slurs and acts of discrimination.

The League reported 92 incidents of vandalism in 1994 and 198 of harassment.

In 1994, hate came off the street and into our schools, homes and computers, said Rochelle Wilner, national vice-president of the League.

The League's audit found that "the computer, utilizing telephone lines, has become the successor to the [telephone] hateline and is presenting a new set of challenges for anti-racists, law enforcement officers and human rights officials ... Both the vastness and the 'culture' of the Internet make [anti-hate] legislation virtually impossible to enforce at present."

The audit reported the white supremacist Heritage Front "opened a bulletin board system in Toronto [that] allows local callers to receive hate messages which range from announcements of meetings to Holocaust denial and other white supremacist propaganda.

"The other type of system is Internet-based ... The Internet allows information to pass freely, unexamined, into Canada. There are message groups, which anyone can access, devoted specifically to Holocaust denial and other neo-Nazi ideologies."

An estimated 30 million homes worldwide are linked by the Internet, said League researcher Richard Berman.

The League called for "creation of a comprehensive policy whereby all hatemongering will be treated equally regardless of mode of broadcast."

Mock urged continued education to counter the effects of anti-Semitic propaganda. While the material may not be easily blocked, by educating teachers and students, young people will be better equipped to resist the hateful messages, she said.

The League also blasted the government of Ontario for failing to prosecute Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel, whose neo-Nazi literature is distributed to 43 countries.

Bullets in mail

"We're in the embarassing position to have the German ambassador to Canada solicit our aid to shut Zundel down," said B'nai Brith president Brian Morris.

Among the incidents reported in the League's annual audit:

- Montreal schools and synagogues were targeted by hatemongers in February and March. Bomb threats and vandalism were "commonplace."
- In March, 14 bullets with an accompanying hate message were mailed to Jewish leaders and organizations in Toronto. No arrests were made.
- Holocaust-denial leaflets were left on cars outside a Kitchener, Ont. theatre screening Schindler's List in August.
- In October, a synagogue in Winnipeg Beach, Man. was vandalized with grafitti.
- In November, three Toronto Jewish-owned businesses were painted with swastikas.

Zundel gets airtime in New York

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ernst Zundel is getting more air time in upstate New York, though not, as in the past, via public-access cable TV.

The Toronto-based Holocaust denier was recently interviewed on a 50,000-watt Albany radio station that can be heard in 38 northern U.S. states. He used the platform to promote his view that Jews did not suffer more than others during World War II.

About 70 demonstrators, including Holocaust survivors and war veterans, protested outside of station WGY.

Shelley Shapiro, spokesperson for Holocaust Survivors & Friends in Pursuit of Justice, said she pleaded with talk show host Mike Gallagher not to give Zundel a platform for his views. She declined an offer to appear on air with Zundel.

"The bottom line is that we do not believe in debating Holocaust denial ... There is no debate on the Holocaust. There is no other side."

Gallagher told Albany reporters he brought Zundel on the show to expose him, though both Shapiro and Keith Marder, a columnist with the Times Union in Albany, suggested he was after controversy to boost the show's ratings.

Meanwhile, Zundel supporter Jack Wikoff of Scipio, N.Y., has filed a formal complaint to the state Commission on Cable Television after two New York cable television companies decided not to broadcast Zundel's Another Voice of Freedom on their community access stations.

The companies argued they are not obliged to air shows presented by non-residents of New York. Wikoff has said he will submit the programs.

Shapiro said she has requested changes to broadcast regulations so that only community residents would qualify under community access provisions. If adopted, that would prevent Wikoff from getting Zundel's show on the air outside his home town.

Vancouver police urged to tackle hate crimes

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Hate crimes demand a special response from law enforcement agencies and civic bodies, says Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC-P).

In a letter to Insp. Ken Doern of the Community Services Section of the Vancouver Police Department, CJC-P executive director Erwin Nest says the police department has "no sufficient system in place to monitor emerging trends and patterns of hate crimes."

Nest says that "despite genuine and often concerted efforts by various levels of government and law enforcement agencies, hate propaganda and its outgrowth, bias crimes, continue to persist with impunity."

The letter, sent by Nest on behalf of the region's officers, was commenting on a recent report on community policing presented to Vancouver city council. In the report, the police outline plans to expand their system of community-based policing, meant to bring the police closer to the average citizen. Advisory groups are being set up "to create a direct access to the police department at a level where accountability and responsiveness can be assured," says the report.

The letter says Congress, as a community-based agency, is "gratified at the growing desire to move ahead with the concept of community policing," but notes such initiatives are usually the first to be affected by lack of funding.

Congress is calling for "specially focused programs to reduce the number of bias-related incidents of racist and religious violence to keep such incidents from spreading."

Congress said it is willing to participate in the consultative process

Fackenheim shines at U of T program

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The doughty 78-year-old philosophy professor is not going gently into the good night.

Emil Fackenheim, who made aliyah 11 years ago, is still a determined and brilliant advocate for Israel, as he proved recently when he gave the keynote address at the symposium celebrating the 25th anniversary of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto.

The sharp-witted professor emeritus at the university was among friends (he helped found the program after all) and was obviously enjoying himself. William Dunphy of St. Michael's College reminded the audience that Fackenheim judged his Phd thesis on Hegel years ago.

In his scholarly address, in the answers he gave to questioners later and in an interview with The CJN, Fackenheim revealed he has lost none of the fire that brought a new recognition of the significance of the Holocaust in his 16 years at the university.

The professor, who lives in Jerusalem and teaches philosophy at Hebrew University, has two sons in Israel, and a daughter and grandchild in England.

Academics come out

In June he visited Toronto for a month and found the city where he spent most of his life a restful change from Jerusalem.

"The Jewish community here is comfortable, too comfortable I believe, and not concerned enough about the Jewish condition in general. I heard a lot of people tell me how glad they were about the peace process but they don't seem to realize how precarious the situation is."

People in Toronto, he said, told him they were worried about violence in the streets. "I wish we had worries like that in Jerusalem."

Fackenheim told The CJN he felt the situation in Israel is "very bad. I don't want to blame anyone, I can't blame the government. It's facing a big problem. [But] when Prime Minister [Yitzhak] Rabin was offered the Nobel Peace Prize, he should have said, 'I can't take it. I'll take it when peace has been achieved.' That would have put Yasser Arafat and the nations of the world on notice."

His chief criticism of Rabin is that the prime minister "is playing his cards close to his chest. This may be good for negotiations but it is bad for morale of the nation."

If a vote was held in Israel today on whether there should be a return to the 1967 borders, or whether the settlements since then should be in Israeli territory, the country would vote in favor of keeping the settlements, he predicted.

"When Rabin made a secret deal at Oslo with Arafat and the PLO he went far beyond what he told the Israeli voters he would do. They voted for Rabin, not for Labor."

He said he was "scandalized" that American academic Noam Chomsky, who has defended the right of Holocaust deniers to free speech, had been given a forum in Convocation Hall at his beloved university. "What Chomsky did was to defend the right of someone to yell 'fire' in a crowded theatre."

Asked why some universities are reluctant to keep Holocaust deniers out, Fackenheim replied that "professors are not a heroic lot," and the situation is symptomatic "of the power of the left."

To one questioner he suggested the title of Mordecai Richler's book This Year in Jerusalem should have been This Year in Israel and Back as Fast as Possible.

He is saddened by the failure of Israeli politicians to speak up for "Jewish dignity," for their readiness to let official visitors bypass Yad Vashem.

Emil Fackenheim: a philosopher's grandfatherly embrace

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer Fred M. Catzman has been researching their origins over the past few years. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

ROSENSTEIN — MARCHASIN — ROTZACK — FISHER

Barbara Roston, of Willowdale, hits a home run. She submits the names of her four grandparents for solution.

Her paternal grandfather was Rosenstein — "rose stone" — a variety of diamond. His wife was Marchasin, a derivative from the given name Mordechai.

Her maternal grandfather was Rotzach. I suspect it is an emasculation of names like Rodzike, Radzikow, or Rudzica. His wife was Fisher, which probably emanates from Ephraim or more prosaically, a dealer in fish.

Paul Martin ignores party labels

By STANLEY LAIKEN

It was a good thing that Minister of Finance Paul Martin wore a Liberal red carnation in his lapel as he rose to deliver his second annual budget in the House of Commons on Feb. 27. Otherwise, from what he presented, he might have been mistaken for a Conservative, despite there only being one male Conservative member of the House these days.

FEDERAL BUDGET COMMENTARY

Who ever heard of a Liberal privatizing Crown corporations? In fact, many have suggested the Conservatives themselves should have taken Martin's budgetary approach years ago. A carnation of any other color would smell the same — to borrow and mangle a line from Shakespeare.

Some were quick to suggest that expenditure reductions of 19 per cent over three years did not go far enough. After all, an annual budgetary deficit projected at almost $33 billion this coming year and just under $25 billion next year still adds about $60 billion to the total federal debt burden, now at about $550 billion, with interest at rising rates compounding daily.

By dropping a few zeros and applying a fraction to these numbers, you can think of this in terms of a family's financial situation if it were carrying a $100,000 debt and was planning to spend a total of $11,000 more than it earned, by borrowing over the next two years at today's interest rates.

Others have said that the budget cuts are too drastic and will severely affect social programs and the much discussed social safety net when less of the federal government's revenues are passed to the provinces next year for spending on health, education and social assistance. The last word on this effect will not be heard until the provincial budgets are brought down later this spring. Only then will we see how the provinces react, although they have been given a year's breathing space. Some face elections, which makes increasing visible taxes politically unfeasible.

Generally, it's hard to fault Martin's objective that government should "do what only government can do best — and leave the rest for those who can do better — whether business, labor or the voluntary sector."

What does it all mean? The economic side of the budget, remember, is a set of projections and plans. What happens to your own financial projections in family budgets and plans? Some work out and some don't. Sometimes circumstances beyond your control result in your failure to reach a financial goal and sometimes your failure to control your finances does the same.

Let's look at some of the changes in taxation. How might the proposals affect you? While there were no personal income tax rate increases, the excise tax on gasoline was increased by 1.5 cents per litre. Although it will raise an extra $500 million a year, the cynics will suggest that the increase was set at a rate that could be buried in the normal price fluctuations.

Several changes were made to retirement savings plans. First the contribution limits for registered retirement savings plans (RRSP) and certain registered pension plans were reduced to $13,500 for 1996. From then, the original plan to increase the limit to $15,500 will continue. This change will affect taxpayers earning over $75,000. Of course, this means it will take these individuals a little longer to accumulate contributions for the maximum allowable pension on retirement, but it has absolutely no effect on the gold-plated pension plan enjoyed by members of Parliament.

In the meantime, you may be given the opportunity to contribute more to the Canada Pension Plan after it is reviewed next fall. The budget also proposed reducing the overcontribution that could be transferred to an RRSP without penalty to $2,000 from $8,000. The original $8,000 was probably overly generous.

Effective July 1, the government proposed to increase the rate of interest it charges on late-paid or unpaid taxes by two per cent. This means that if you don't pay your taxes or instalments when they are due, you will be charged four per cent more in interest than the government will pay you on refund amounts owed to you. This concept of tax fairness is understood only by the government.

If you have received Old Age Security (OAS) payments, but all or part of them were clawed back because your income exceeded $53,215, the government will only pay you the amount that won't be clawed back, starting in July 1996. How nice of them to save you the aggravation of cashing the cheque and then having to pay it back with your next tax return.

If your portfolio of investments is held in a private holding corporatio instead of personally, you have been benefiting from a tax deferral for as long as the investment income (interest, rents and capital gains) has been left in the corporation. The budget proposes a refundable tax that will remove the deferred benefit you have been enjoying.

If you have used family trusts to hold property for your beneficiaries and to split income with lower-income family members, the tax and advantages that were planned have been rendered considerably less effective.

Finally, the budget proposed to levy a user fee of $975 on each adult applying to immigrate to Canada, starting Feb. 28. The fee must be paid on application and will be refunded if the application is unsuccessful.

On the taxation side, it could have been worse, but then you might have had an opportunity to join a full-scale tax revolt.

On the budget: Does it enhance life?

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

(Excerpted from a sermon in Toronto on Feb. 25, Sidra: Vayakhel)

With this as background (That life is a gift, not even the one to whom it has been given has a right to dispose of it), let us reflect on current attempts to reduce the fiscal deficit in the country — both federally and in the Provinces — by creating an even greater social deficit everywhere, and particularly when it comes to the preservation of life. The nagging question is whether saving money may lead to the loss of life through inadequate health care or an insufficient social safety net. Nobody in power will admit to it, but can we really be sure? And if we can't, what should our stance be today?

To cut spending on that which makes ours a welfare state has united all the political parties. If they disagree, it is only on the severity of the cuts. They tell us, of course, that essential health care and related services will remain the same. Curtailing social services is said to be a way of avoiding abuse. Can we afford to believe them?

Because our own money is so sacred to most of us, we like to believe them. The thought of paying more taxes to preserve life — our own and that of others — by making sure that good and swift health care and social services are available is so unpopular among the vast majority of the population that it will believe anything as long as it costs less. That is the mood of the country today.

Those who live in big cities and have additional means, or good contacts, are more likely to manage despite the cuts. Those who are poor and live in remote places may not get by. Most Jews live in urban centres and belong to the middle classes. Therefore, most of us tend to be sympathetic to the call for more cuts, less taxes and reducing the deficit. We can all make a good, rational, economic case for this stance, and often we do.

But is that enough?

Should not the Jewish emphasis on life inform our stance in the current debate [on social spending], irrespective of our class interests and political orientation? I am convinced they should, and that's why I have been involved, together with other religious people, urging government not to victimize the weakest. And I am proud that our own Reform [Judaism] movement has lent its support to these endeavors.

As free citizens of this free country, we Jews, like everybody else, must participate in its political life. But that does not mean we must shed our Jewish heritage in the process. On the contrary. To combine our responsibility for the present with our response to the past means to pursue an independent line in matters of Canadian social policy. It should be a line based not on economics, but on compassion for the disadvantaged; not on class interests, but on justice for the weak; not on political allegiances, but on moral criteria. And all of these rest on the Jewish commitment to the sanctity of life, which it is society's task to enhance — at all cost.

In deciding where we stand on an issue, we owe it to ourselves always to ask the question, Does this measure endanger life or enhance it?

Rabbi Dow Marmur is the senior rabbi of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

Shabbat Zachor

In Hebrew, Zachor is the imperative form of the verb remember. It appears in the Bible, in various derivatives, no less than 169 times. The biblical injunction to remember is not merely a response to collective curiosity. It is a summons to an entire people, a calling which hearkens us back to the beginning of our history and which provides an avenue to an infinite future.

Almost 2,000 years ago, the ancient Sages designated the Sabbath before the holiday of Purim as Shabbat Zachor. Its name derives from the extra Torah and prophetic readings surrounding the commandment "to remember all that Amalek did to you ... and to blot out its memory from under heaven."

The connection between Amalek and Purim is quite direct. Haman, the villain in the story of Purim, is believed to have been a descendant of the Amalekites. Moreover, the villainy which he had intended for the Jewish people of Persia, namely mass slaughter and butchery, was the very evil for which the name Amalek has become synonymous through the ages.

Thus, the Rabbis found it useful to tie the two — Amalek and Purim — together as a sanguinary reminder to the people that we must always actively oppose and stand against the uniquely pernicious evil that preys upon and slaughters "the feeble, the weak, the exhausted and the weary."

Twenty-one years ago, six young Jewish adults from Syria, in the very prime and flower of their lives, were treacherously set upon and murdered as they were trying to "escape" to Israel. The yahrzeit of their murders has been observed on Shabbat Zachor. And the campaign to rescue the remnant of Syrian Jewry, which had been launched in earnest, if in partial secrecy, three years earlier, became the special focus for Jews the world over on Shabbat Zachor.

In Jewish law and in Jewish history, pidyon shvuyim, the ransoming of captives, has always occupied a place of high personal and communal obligation. The fulfilment of this obligation was regarded by the Rabbis as paramount. Money set aside for charitable purposes or even for the building of a synagogue was always allowed to be used to ransom captives. Maimonides even said that the duty to ransom captives superseded the duty of giving charity to the poor.

Today, fewer than 150 Jews remain in Syria. But they remain because they want to. For all intents and purposes, the Jews of Syria have been rescued from the captivity that Syria had become for them over the past half century.

Many individuals played a part in the rescue and in the ransom, literally, of Syria's Jews. But the driving force of the movement, widely acknowledged as such among both the rescued and the rescuers, was Judy Feld Carr. In this issue of The CJN she imparts publicly for the first time some of the harrowing details of the story behind the rescue. In reaching out to the Jews of Syria, she walked alongside the spirits of some of Jewish history's other rare and determined individuals such as Rabbi Samuel Aboab, Dona Gracia Mendes, and Sir Moses Montefiore, for whom pidyon shvuyim was also a call to conscience.

The six young Jews were simply trying to find their way to a home in Israel. They were betrayed and butchered. We pronounce their names with reverence.

Plea from son of Holocaust survivors

With the coming of the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the death camps, and being the offspring of two survivors of the Holocaust, it is hard to put into words the total suffering the survivors endured at the hands of their Nazis captors.

The physical abuse and deprivation was secondary to the mental torment and dehumanization now etched in their minds and with which they must live for the rest of their lives. The liberation of the death camps also marks a time for us to remember the countless millions butchered by their captors, but more importantly, clearly illustrates man's inhumanity to his fellow man.

Those who deny the Holocaust happened, and those who believe that after 50 years we should forgive and forget, are just trying to wash away their guilt. It is easier to forget than to face the reality and magnitude of the dead. Six million Jews and millions of others were exterminated for no other reason than their race, religious beliefs and nationality. To forget is to forget the sacrifice of each and every one of these people. To forget is to make us condone this crime and become accomplices by our own silence. Our silence has already resulted in genocides in both Uganda and Rwanda in recent years.

Let us mark this 50th anniversary not only as the commemoration of those who died in the death camps, but as a renewal to our resolve that this should never happen again to anyone. Then, and only then, can we say we have truly honored the memory of those who perished.

Ethics concern of Secular Jewish Association

As a leader of the Secular Jewish Association (SJA) I wanted to express my appreciation to Ron Csillag for the article on the SJA's 25th anniversary (CJN Feb. 16). He covered a lot of ground and gave a good overview of our organization.

While the article correctly notes the importance of ethnicity and culture to secular humanistic Judaism, it doesn't mention the strong emphasis on ethics which is a fundamental concern of the movement.

Secular humanistic Jewish observances and celebrations of holidays and life cycle events affirm our beliefs, our joy in belonging to the Jewish people and the civilization we have created; our belief in personal responsibility to ourselves and to society; and our faith that human beings have the power to bring about Tikkun Olam.

A challenge to Jewish schools

Re "Parents of disabled call out to community" (CJN Feb. 2) by Leila Speisman.

The first four paragraphs of this article are the best I have ever seen in The CJN regarding the state of affairs. They clearly indicate that the frustrations are not caused by the child but by the system. The "cry for help" is not for the community to take our children away, to pity us, to extend charity or do a time-limited mitzvah. The message is that our children belong to the community as much as any other Jewish child and should have equal opportunity to participate in it.

They are not our burden (they do have less typical needs to be met), they do not "suffer from" disabilities (they have disabilities), and we love them as much as any parent loves his or her children.

By making genuine efforts to enfranchise those people to whom we, as a community, have not traditionally reached out, we would not only be telling our children and youth that all people are valued as individuals to be welcomed and included, but also that it is we, as a community, who provide the welcome and support, rather than merely tolerate and leave them to their devices.

I am watching with much interest the fight for educational funding. However it turns out, it could still leave certain children out in the cold. We could always find reasons for not being able to do things financially.

Since when was financial difficulty a barrier to whatever the Jewish people were determined to do? I do not need to elaborate on our accomplishments over the decades and centuries. It comes down to how important it is to impart the real meaning of community, regardless of differences among individuals due to abilities and other irrelevant labels. I recently learned of children with behavior problems being taken out of the Jewish schools to go to appropriate programs in public schools. Does our educational system not have educators who are just as capable of learning how to meet the children's needs?

Why do other Jewish families as well as I have to direct our taxes to the Catholic system in order to access educational settings where our children can be with peers who are good role models, where they have teachers who understand how to help our children learn?

If the Jewish community is concerned about continuity, intermarriage and assimilation, it must begin to deliberately set up environments which do not chase people away. As Irving Abella has said: "We must try to build a Jewish community that is not simply concerned with survival, but one that is creative and attractive to our children, a community with substance and content, a community that stresses not only memory and remembrance, but other important values of our tradition — social justice, equity and compassion."

Jewish content in schools is important. But just as important is the day-to-day humanity we want our children to experience and live. We need to teach them that everyone is welcome — whether disabled, elderly, or married to a non-Jewish partner.

The public school system is in the process of gathering examples of exemplary practice in integrated education for students with exceptionalities. I hope the Jewish educational system and places of worship will not let us down by failing to pay attention to the importance of this aspect to our people. Remember Hillel: If not now, when?

But the word "rescue" — for so long verboten — is now uttered openly, as is the matter of bribery of top Syrian officials. How high in the iron-fisted administration of President Hafez al-Assad were palms greased? Carr balks. "At the highest levels. That's all I can say."

What she can say is that bribes — baksheesh in the vernacular — were only paid for poor members of the community and only for those who sought Carr out. "I was the last resort," she says. "When a family needed to get out and didn't have the finances, they knew who to contact. But they had to find me, and that wasn't easy. They couldn't call me; that would be the kiss of death. No one knew my last name or where I lived. I was 'the lady in Canada' or 'Mrs. Judy.'

"But there were various ways of contacting me. They had to be told to get in touch with somebody who would get in touch with somebody else, and so on. Sometimes a member of a family would come out for a visit and speak to people in New York. Some people even came to Toronto."

In fact, she adds jokingly, "Who's sleeping over tonight?" became a frequent refrain in the Carr household, as young Syrian Jews passed through, en route to New York or Israel. "And that was despite direct warnings not to visit me," Carr adds.

One expert has called her efforts "a kind of underground railroad." Carr estimates that her personal involvement led to the rescue of between 2,000 and 2,500 Syrian Jews.

Not bad, she allows in a rare moment of self-aggrandizement, for a trained musicologist with no background in pidyon shvuyim — redemption of the captives.

But her interest was kindled in 1971, when she and her late husband, Dr. Ronald Feld, were horrified by a Jerusalem Post story about 12 young Jewish men killed by land mines while trying to escape from Syria. The Felds were active in Soviet Jewry.

But their energies were soon diverted to the Arab world after they discovered that Syrian Jews were locked away in a closed and oppressive land. There was no telephone service to Syria and mail was carefully screened.

Nonetheless, the Felds managed to make contact with Rabbi Avraham Hamra in Damascus, who sent back a wish list of religious books and supplies. Communications, achieved through telegrams, were handled with the utmost care, since Syrian Jews were under constant surveillance. A code was established, based on the Old Testament and the book of Psalms, to convey information on the community's status and confirm that packages had arrived. Parcels contained Haggadot, volumes of the Steinsaltz Talmud, teaching aids, tefillin and tallesim, even wedding gowns.

Then, personal tragedy struck. In 1973, Ronald Feld died suddenly, leaving a 33-year-old widow and three young children. That same year, Carr established the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation. A similar fund was set up at Beth Tfiloh Congregation in Baltimore in 1985.

Over the years, the two funds collected more than $1 million, used at first to send the books and supplies (including baksheesh for postal and customs officials), and later to pay for airline tickets and the graft it took to obtain passports, exit visas and other documents.

The funds also helped ease the misery of Jews imprisoned over the years, paying for personal items like soap, shampoo, clothing and medicine, as well as buying off guards and the occasional judge.

Family matriarch Badria Baslo (seated) was rescued by Judy Feld Carr, as were most of her kin. They now live in Jerusalem. [Orah Buck photo]

Carr's first rescue was in 1974: a young man with a heart problem, who went through Lebanon to Israel, where he died after surgery. Then came the 1978 rescue of a rabbi from Aleppo, who was treated for cancer at Toronto's Mount Sinai hospital, and then made aliyah. He died in Israel a few weeks after arriving, but not before being reunited with his 97-year-old mother.

The pace of rescues picked up considerably through the 1980s, which saw the arrests and torture of several Syrian Jews on charges of espionage, treason and visiting Israel. Emigration for Jews, whose every move was monitored by the feared secret police, was strictly prohibited, although some travel was allowed, provided exorbitant bonds were posted. Mail and telephone calls were censored and passports were (and still are) stamped "Moussawi" (Jew). The sale of property was forbidden.

Oddly, the Nazi-like measures did not apply to the practice of Judaism. Jews were permitted to attend synagogues, children went to Jewish schools (although they were supervised by Muslims) and kosher meat was available.

Carr is proud to note that through the years, not one cent of the Feld funds went to pay salaries or overhead, and no money was ever taken from United Jewish Appeal or from the Israeli government, which offered help. Publicity was kept to a minimum.

The ruins of the Aleppo synagogue. Reconstruction was halted years ago.

A public face to the campaign has been provided by Canadian Jewish Congress's National Task Force for Syrian Jews, which Carr heads. She used Congress' clout to lobby Canadian authorities. In 1991, 14 members of Parliament and senators formed a working group dedicated to free emigration for Syrian Jews. Carr also has high praise for Canadian diplomatic officials, in both Ottawa and Damascus, for the roles they played.

U.S. organizations have not sat idly by. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee estimates it channeled some $10 million in relief aid to Syrian Jewry, before ending the assistance last year. Other groups did likewise, and despite its name, the New York-based Council for the Rescue of Syrian Jews did not conduct actual rescues. In a recent interview, council director Gil Kahn said that area was reserved solely for Carr: "She has devoted her life to it."

Her devotion has helped to save the remnant of a community that dates to biblical times. Syrian Jewry numbered 15,000 in 1948. By 1992, it was 4,000; today, there are fewer than 150 Jews left. Assad has promised they can leave whenever they wish but Carr feels most will remain behind, afraid or unwilling to start anew somewhere else. About half of all emigres have settled in Israel; the rest in Brooklyn, with a smattering in France, England and Mexico. Rabbi Hamra, who became Syria's Chief Rabbi, arrived in Israel last October. With him was his 14-year-old daughter, Judy.

The Feld fund has not closed, though. Carr says there are still some poor Jews in Syria who need aid or plane tickets.

These days find Carr in New York and Israel, attending simchas of those she helped rescue. Always, she's introduced as "Mrs. Judy," and tears of joy are invariably shed during reunions or first-time meetings.

"I'm not being melodramatic," Carr says, "but I cannot believe when I look back on 23 years that I knew how to do this, how I understood the neshamah (soul) of these people without having met them, how they came to trust the name of somebody they didn't know. How could a man who never met me leave his child in my house and then return to Syria? The only time I know of this happening was during the Shoah, when children were left with a stranger. How did this happen? It's almost astounding ..."

Chronology of events

1947: Arab rioters destroy all synagogues in Aleppo, five Jewish schools and most of the city's Jewish-owned property.

1949: The Damascus synagogue is bombed and the city's Jewish Council declared illegal. Some 6,000 of Syria's 15,000 Jews opt to flee, a clandestine exodus that would end in 1951.

1953: Bank accounts of Jews are frozen.

1956: The Suez crisis triggers random arrests and torture of Jews.

1958: A decree that Jews may emigrate on the condition their property is transfered to the government is soon cancelled, and trials begin for those who helped Jews leave.

1964: A law is passed prohibiting Jews from traveling more than five km beyond the limits of their home towns.

1967: In Qamishli, 57 Jews are murdered by mobs. Anti-Jewish riots in Damascus and Aleppo follow Israel's victory in the Six-Day War.

1970: President Hafez al-Assad comes to power. Life eases somewhat for the country's 4,500 Jews. They may attend university, own telephones and drive cars, but are barred from emigrating.

1971: Twelve Jews trying to escape are killed by mines. The news travels to the West.

1974: Four young Jewish women and two young men trying to escape are betrayed by their Arab smugglers and murdered. Their yahrzeit is observed on Shabbat Zachor.

1977: Assad permits about 350 unmarried Jewish women to leave.

1987: Jewish brothers Eli and Selim Swed are jailed for allegedly visiting Israel. In 1991, they are sentenced to an additional 6½ years. The Sweds, who became cause celebres in the West, are released in April 1992 and leave Syria two years after that.

1992: Assad relaxes travel restrictions for Jews, following pressure from the U.S. in the wake of the Gulf War. In six months, over 2,500 Jews flee as tourists, leaving behind homes and businesses, before the doors close again in October.

1993-1994: Jews continue to trickle out, and most head to the Syrian Jewish emigre community in Brooklyn.

1994: Syria's Chief Rabbi Avraham Hamra arrives in Israel.

1995: The exodus of Syrian Jewry is declared complete. A handful of Jews remains: five in Aleppo, two families in Qamishli and about 130 individuals in Damascus.

Things weren't always the same

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

While the Bible, in the book of Koheleth, tells us that we should not glorify the past as having been better than the present, there are some things that deserve grateful remembrance.

In my recent change of residence, I had occasion to review the past while going through boxes of old correspondence and other yellowed papers. In doing so, I came across some old envelopes, all of them dated 1937.

I had written a series of articles for the Berlin Jewish community newspaper and had described what it meant to be a newcomer to the United States. At the time, I was a rabbinic student at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati.

The articles brought responses from all the over world, and although the writers did not have my exact address, the post office somehow managed to find me — I am not quite sure how. I was not then a rabbi with an address you could look up in the newspaper, but a student living in the dormitory of the college.

But here is an example of the ingenuity of the Cincinnati post office. A letter came from a refugee who had made it to Tientsin, China, and who had read my article in the Berlin Jewish community newspaper. He was a Dr. Bernhard Silverstein, living at 85 Meadows Rd. in Tientsin. (Perhaps there are some readers of The Canadian Jewish News who may remember him.)

Contemplating this and similar pieces of postal ingenuity, I wondered what the post offices in Canada or the United States would do with such a missive today. Actually, I didn't wonder at all.

In fact, I had an interesting contretemps with the Canada Post Corporation. It went back a few months and unfolded as follows: One day I received an urgent call from the University of Berlin asking me why I had not responded to their invitation to give the convocation address. I confessed, truthfully, that this was the first time I had ever heard about it. Said the caller: But we wrote to you many weeks ago. I replied that the letter had not arrived, and we took it from there.

I did receive the letter eventually. It was delivered to me on Nov. 16, and had been sent from Berlin by express post on Sept. 23.

Ordinarily I let this kind of thing pass by as one of those matters which are best forgotten. However, I had suffered some embarrassment on the occasion, and so had the university. So I took pen to hand and wrote to the Canada Post Corporation in Ottawa, setting forth what had happened.

A few weeks ago I received the following response:

"Thank you for your letter regarding a letter mailed from the University of Berlin on Sept. 23 and delivered to you on Nov. 16, 1994.

"I apologize for the embarrassment you have experienced as a result of this unfortunate incident. I surely recognize the importance of timely and consistent mail delivery. Unfortunately, express post is not a traceable item and we cannot determine the cause of the delay or where it occurred. Please accept the enclosed booklet of stamps as a gesture of good customer relations."

In sorting out my mailbag, I came across a relatively new publication (or so I assume). It is called Jewish Women's Forum (JWF) and is published in Toronto. The journal sets forth its mission as follows:

This publication is for all Jewish women. JWF aims to provide an open forum for women across the spectrum of Jewish society. We believe that by acknowledging and respecting the diversity among us we can create a strong community. When we applaud all our parts we will be more unified.

The Jewish Women's Forum seeks to encourage women to realize their potency in both their private and public lives and to envision themselves as initiators of positive change.

We decry violence, hatred and destruction. We promote respect for life. Our goal is to play a role in creating a shift from a patriarchial society to a partnership society.

The articles in the sample issue I received were thoughtful and varied; and they certainly covered the entire spectrum of Jewish religious life. I wish the publishers well.

Children reflect life

By Jack Chisvin

They stare at us from behind the TV screen — children with distended bellies and glazed bulbous eyes, emaciated beyond recognition — a fleshless hand held out silently pleading. They are without hope. These harrowing pictures stir our conscience and haunt us. But there are other children, not of our world, who affirm life, and I have met these children.

The pyramid, built by an ancient civilization, is located a short drive from Mexico City. Even in the cool air at that altitude, the climb to the top was exhausting. Reaching our destination, we were greeted by two young boys selling antiquities. "The real McCoy," they assured us. As my wife caught her breath and was mentally converting pesos into dollars, there was silence, which they mistook for haggling. Sensing a lost sale, they immediately cut the price in half. Who could resist the bargain even if the carvings were plaster imitations?

The Aegean Sea was running high with man-made flotsam all about us. As the steamer rode the crest of each wave, we could see the white cube houses stacked on the hill of the distant island. Disembarking, we walked the lonely beach. After we had walked for over an hour in the shimmering heat, we were overcome by thirst. The corrugated iron refreshment booth, run by an operator not yet in his teens, couldn't have been more strategically located. I have paid less for a bottle of good wine than I had to pay for his tacky drink. That entrepreneur didn't need any lessons in economics — he knew the laws of supply and demand.

South of Eilat, the Red Sea takes a bite out of the Sinai coast, forming a deep fjord. The scow landed directly on the desolate desert where we were to examine Nubian etchings. The wind, ceaselessly blowing for centuries, eroding the rocks into grotesque shapes, sounded like a weeping child. The little Bedouin materialized out of nowhere, a black dress loosely draping her thin body, red hair covered with dust. As if on cue, cameras were raised to take her photograph. At this gesture, she started out-howling the wind. We chose to ignore her. From what appeared to be a rock, he uncurled, ramrod straight, a high-powered rifle on his shoulder. It didn't take us long to interpret the child's demands: "American dollar" — the price for permitting us to photograph her. The man's presence ensured that we understood.

Every conceivable conveyance fills the streets of Bangkok with noise and foul air. Wending our way through the teeming throng we spotted him, darting in, out and around people. A uniformed boy scout, who would have made any mother proud, travelling a planned course. Inevitably our paths crossed. He saluted and in a sing-song voice, repeated the scout's pledge while handing me an autograph book. The minimum "donation" for my signature was 200 baht. I gave him 20. Surprising profanity and obscenities emerged from his mouth. He caused such a row that I feared we would be attacked for child molesting. We quickly negotiated a settlement for 100 baht and lost ourselves in the crowd.

Children everywhere are a reflection of the world in which they live.

Time is not on side of peace

By Yechiavahu Arnon

In October 1991, former U.S. president George Bush managed to convene the Madrid Peace Conference, but he failed to advance the cause before he left the scene, together with two other protagonists of the occasion, former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and then Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir.

In Madrid, the PLO was disguised as a nameless component of the Jordanian-Palestinian team, but it took the stage in Oslo two years later, recognized by Israel.

There was no American stage management, but President Bill Clinton was eager to host the signing ceremony on the White House lawn. On the list of his priorities, the Middle East often changed place with other international trouble spots. Now, when the peace process is barely alive, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher is here trying to reanimate it, with particular emphasis on the Syrian-Lebanese sector.

What went wrong? First of all, the Oslo timetable for the implementation of the agreement with the Palestinians, indispensable for the intended psychological breakthrough, was ignored. The seduction of peace was of short duration and ceased to motivate many of its supporters to press hard for progress. Islamic terror and Israeli counter-measures still dominate the scene in Southern Lebanon, where clashes are on the increase.

In Gaza, on the other hand, extremists are now more controlled by the PLO than before and the partial closure of the area helps to better screen the smaller number of Arabs who seek employment in Israel. But this measure has increased penury and frustration amongst the tens of thousands who are not allowed in.

While frequent Israel-PLO contacts maintain a semblance of continuity in spite of the crisis, the open Syrian-Israeli negotiations have been discontinued, leaving every observer to guess whether secret contacts are still going on and what results, if any, are to be expected. The one encouraging event during the long months of stalemate and diminishing hopes remains the conclusion of the peace treaty with Jordan. But it will only prosper in a more benign regional environment, of which there is no sign at the moment.

Who is to blame? The key here is terror and indeed, public reaction to its savagery left the government little choice but to slow down the whole peace process with the PLO. Many Israelis accustomed to holding Yasser Arafat responsible for not curbing Hamas terror tend to forget their own mighty security apparatus was not all that successful in controlling it when Israel alone ruled Gaza.

Oslo timetable

Had the Oslo timetable been implemented as planned, the Israel army would by now have been absent from the densely populated Arab centres, and an elected Palestinian authority would be in place and its ability to maintain order tested. The initial idea was that for the duration of the autonomy period, joint Palestinian-Israeli security would guarantee peaceful coexistence in the territories, interspersed as they are with Jewish settlements.

But the scheme was doomed to failure from the very start. Though at the time it seemed correct to avoid the highly emotional issue of a Jewish presence in the massively populated Arab West Bank and leave all options open for ulterior negotiations, the one logical step would have been to at least slightly modify the map of that Jewish presence to maximize its security.

In the inflamed climate of the territories, the opportunities for ethnic friction should have been reduced if an atmosphere of conciliation was to be encouraged. But this same political climate is also the cause of the present paralysis in the negotiations. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his partner Arafat, both subjected to severe internal pressures, are equally unable to maintain the momentum of peace upon which their political survival and regional detente ultimately depends.

They are both in a hurry to score convincing points with their respective public opinions but are wasting precious time by raising expectations that cannot be fulfilled and blaming each other for the impasse. By losing their grip on their confused constituencies, they are further reducing the chances for their partnership to succeed. Though neither is openly abandoning the peace process, they are both endangering its progress. Each leader is expecting the other to deliver more than he can.

Still, their partnership, uncomfortable as it is, is irreplaceable in the present Mideastern reality. While the international community takes an interest in the stranded peace process, it is unwilling to intervene effectively, either financially or politically, should the parties fail in their own efforts to reach understanding.

Those who close their minds to the crucial role of an Israeli-Palestinian solution in a regional settlement risk repeating old mistakes. As the public here will soon be distracted by the fireworks of the primaries for the next general elections, realism will again be subordinated to populist slogans, leaving little room for wisdom to prevail. And in the meantime, time is running out.

Einstein Archives are priceless

On the 40th anniversary of Albert Einstein's death, Sheldon Kirshner visited the Einstein Archives in Jerusalem.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

On his only visit to Palestine, in 1923, the great physicist Albert Einstein (1879-1955) expressed the wish that the Hebrew University be the custodian of his private papers.

Nearly 60 years passed before they were finally given to the university. But today, the Einstein Archives, with 45,000 catalogued items, is reportedly the largest repository of its kind in the world.

Composed of documents, letters, manuscripts, books, diaries, monographs, lecture notes, poems, clippings, photographs, film footage, records and medals, the archives were brought to Israel 15 years ago from Princeton University, with which Einstein was associated following his emigration from Germany.

The Einstein Archives had been in the care of Einstein's friend and trustee, Otto Nathan, and Einstein's secretary and co-trustee, Helen Dukas. But after arduous negotiations, the trove was transferred to the Hebrew University's National Library, thus fulfilling Einstein's wish and bolstering its own burgeoning collection.

The curator of the archives, Ze'ev Rosenkranz, is a diffident 33-year-old Australian historian who made aliyah in 1981 and assumed his present position in 1989.

Ask Rosenkranz what the most priceless piece in the collection is and he responds without skipping a beat.

"The original, hand-written draft of the general theory of relativity," he says, referring to the theorem which helped catalpult Einstein into the stratospheric ranks of science.

As Rosenkranz will tell you, the archives keep expanding, acquiring upwards of 1,000 new items annually. Recent acquisitions include a 1952 letter to the Israeli ambassador in Italy in which he denies a newspaper report that he is partial to pork; several letters from Einstein to the American Association of University Women on behalf of three Jewish refugee academics from Germany and Austria; and part of a photographic collection containing family photos and portraits.

As might be expected, even from so austere a figure as Einstein, rather eccentric letters pop up.

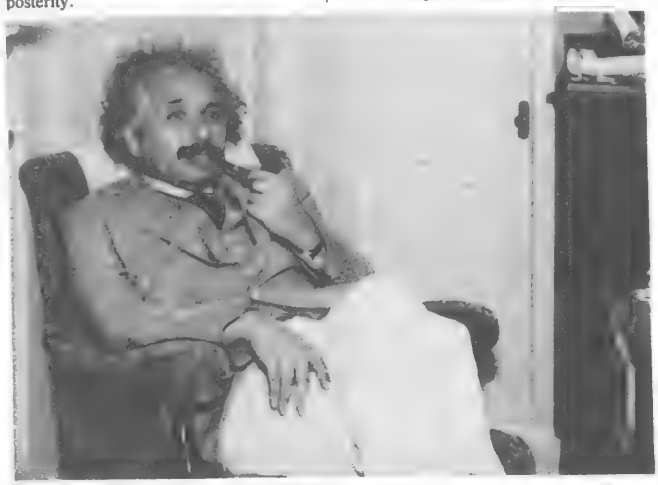
There is a request for Einstein's right shoe; a suggestion that he ought to cut his unruly shock of hair "so you can look better"; and a missive arguing that romantic love is a function of gravitation. (To the latter, Einstein replied that "falling in love was not the most stupid thing that people can do, but gravitation cannot be held responsible for it.")

Ze'ev Rosenkranz.

The archives are broadly divided into scientific and non-scientific manuscripts and correspondence.

The heart and soul of the scientific manuscript collection is from the year 1905, when he published four revolutionary articles on the theory of relativity, Brownian motion and the photo-electric effect (for which he was cited when he won the 1921 Nobel Prize for physics).

Unfortunately, none of the pre-1914 manuscripts are originals. "Einstein probably threw them away," says Rosenkranz, who previously worked at the Central Zionist Archives. "He wasn't thinking of posterity."



Albert Einstein in his prime.

Einstein's scientific correspondence, which begins in the early 1900s and ends at his death, is addressed to such luminaries as Max Planck, Niels Bohr, Werner Heisenberg, Enrico Fermi, Leo Szilard and Erwin Schrodinger.

To Rosenkranz, the most interesting of these letters, addressed to Heisenberg and Schrodinger in the 1930s, deal with the field of quantum mechanics. "On this issue," Rosenkranz observes, "Einstein became increasingly isolated."

Not all his letters revolve around physics. Einstein ruminated about nationalism, the rise of fascism, Zionism, pacifism and the plight of European Jewish refugees fleeing Nazism. And in a light-hearted vein, he wrote about his holiday plans.

The letters, Rosenkranz believes, reveal "a very lively person with a sense of humor and wit, but also a compassionate person critical of human nature."

Among the most pungent letters are those which espouse reconciliation between Germany and France after World War I. "Einstein was a sort of ambassador-at-large for Weimar Germany."

Einstein's non-scientific correspondence was conducted with people like Sigmund Freud, Bertrand Russell, George Bernard Shaw, Thomas Mann, Walther Rathenau and Upton Sinclair.

Rosenkranz is particularly intrigued with Einstein's exchange with Freud, in which they discussed the nature of war. The letters were later published in several languages.

Not surprisingly, the archives are in possession of a number of Einstein's letters that are off-limits even to scholars. Highly personal, they touch on his relationship with his first wife and sons and on his extra-marital affair with Betty Neumann, one of his secretaries.

By contrast, Einstein's letters dealing with his views of Zionism are anything but controversial.

Einstein was introduced to Zionism in Prague, and in time he made the acquaintance of Chaim Weizmann (1874-1952), the prime mover behind the 1917 Balfour Declaration, the long-serving president of the World Zionist Organization and the first president of the state of Israel.

In 1921, Einstein accepted Weizmann's offer to accompany him on a tour of the United States to raise funds for the nascent Hebrew University and to buy land in Palestine.

Two years later, in February, he visited Palestine for 12 days, registering his impressions in a diary that is now in the collection of the Pierpont Morgan Library in New York City. (The Hebrew University has a copy.)

Einstein was impressed with the kibbutzim, not only because he supported the idea of Jews returning to the land as farmers but because he regarded collective settlements as the apotheosis of the Zionist dream.

He was less enamored of the Jewish politicians he met, thinking they were leaving too many stones unturned in the quest to reach an accommodation with the Arab population of Palestine.

"He deeply believed that Jews had to be ethical with the Arab minority in Israel," says Rosenkranz. "That would be proof of the legitimacy of Israel's statehood. One can imply from his letters that he thought that Israeli Arabs were second-class citizens."

While in Palestine, Einstein delivered a lecture at the Hebrew University's Mount Scopus campus. Subsequently, he was appointed to its first board of governors and named chair of its academic committee. Till the end of his days, he never lost interest in the university. In fact, on the eve of his death, he participated in a fundraising campaign for a new campus on Givat Ram.

Before he left Palestine, Einstein was made an honorary citizen of Tel Aviv by its popular mayor, Meir Dizengoff. In Haifa, where he planted a tree, Zionist officials implored him to settle in the Yishuv. "His heart said yes, but his mind said no," says Rosenkranz.

Although Einstein abhorred nationalism, he supported the creation of a Jewish spiritual centre in Palestine which he hoped would reinforce the cultural identity of Jews in the Diaspora. Before 1948, he opposed Jewish statehood. But with the establishment of Israel, he resigned himself to its existence.

In 1952, after Weizmann's death, Einstein was offered the presidency of Israel. But he declined, claiming he lacked "the natural aptitude and the experience to deal properly with people and to exercise official functions."

Mideast Analysis
By Sheldon Kirshner

Iraqi expertise

When Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990, setting the stage for the 1991 Gulf War, the world media turned to Amatzia Baram.

He appeared on American, European and Japanese TV and radio, including CBS, CNN and BBC, and he was interviewed by, among others, the New York Times and London Times.

Last October, when Iraq dominated the headlines once again by manoeuvering its army perilously close to Kuwait's border, the media called on his expertise once more.

A Haifa University historian, Baram is in high demand as an analyst because of the depth and breadth of his knowledge. He is apparently one of only two Israeli scholars who specialize in Iraq (the other is Ofra Bengio of Tel Aviv University).

Baram, 57, is also courted by the Israeli government, being a member of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' advisory team on Middle Eastern affairs. As well, the U.S. government and its agencies have used him as a consultant.

Originally a Kfar Menachem kibbutznik and a science teacher, Baram switched course in 1971 when he took up Middle Eastern studies at the Hebrew University. He zoomed in on Iraq because it was relatively neglected as an academic subject. Israeli historians tended to focus on contiguous Arab countries such as Syria, Jordan and Egypt, leaving Iraq — a distant regional power — out in the cold.

Baram, who also lectures at the Israeli National Security College, wrote his doctorate thesis in 1978 on political thought and practice in Iraq under the ruling Ba'ath party.

Since then, he has written one book — Culture, History and Ideology in the Formation of Ba'athist Iraq: 1968-1989 and edited Iraq's Road to the Gulf War. In addition, he has churned out a steady stream of monographs on Iraq's development.

Baram is of the view that Iraq remains "on the backburner" of Israeli intelligence priorities. As a result, he said, the Israeli government was "absolutely shocked" by the extent of Iraq's pre-Gulf War nuclear program. "We knew only a small part of what Iraq had."

Not being able to travel to Iraq and absorb impressions on a first-hand basis, Baram acknowledges that he is at a disadvantage. But Baram — and the three graduate students he supervises — are able to keep up with current trends by reading five Iraqi daily newspapers, which arrive several weeks late.

Judging him from a distance, Baram believes that Saddam Hussein rejects advice which runs counter to his own inclinations, a flaw which may prove fatal in the future. Baram believes that his regime is not threatened at present, but that it could be if food rations are eliminated.

Baram scoffs at the idea that Israel and Iraq can come to terms while Saddam Hussein is in power.

Silence

Suddenly the bomb blasted, then...silence.
The silence of pain, the silence of hatred,
And twenty-one souls ascended to their God
Sacrificed by hate on the alter of their lives.

The silence was filled by the cry of the wounded.
The silence was torn by the tears of their parents.

Twenty-one who were taken, and with them, many more,
The price of our existence paid for with their lives.

But in our hearts, the hope
That we'll never have to hear
The silence of such hatred,
The cry of the wounded,
Or the parents burning tear.

And may it be Thy will that they will be the last to ascend thus to Your side.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI ELY BRAUN

On Shabbat Zachor (Shabbat of Remembrance) we read from two Torahs. Shabbat Zachor is named for the special Maftir (Ovarim 25:17-19) read from a second Torah scroll on the Shabbat preceding Purim.

Hearing this reading is a mitzvah aseh (a positive Torah commandment), obligatory as law for all adult Jews. The Torah tells us to "Remember what Amalek did unto you by the way as ye came forth out of Egypt ... that thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under the heaven; thou shalt not forget."

Maimonides sees three commandments in this reading, two positive and one negative: To blot out the memory of Amalek and to remember what they did to Israel, as well as not to forget the evil done by Amalek.

A perplexing question arises when we look at the emphasis on remembering Amalek. Midrash Tanchuma on Parshat Ki Titze says, "The L-rd said to Israel: Be very diligent in remembering those two remembrances which I wrote in the Torah ..." How ironic it is that the only reference to Amalek are the 39 times in 37 verses of the Tanach. No ancient Near Eastern documents refer to the Amalekites. Were it not for our biblical references, the world would not know of Amalek. Yet we are told to blot out his memory.

Nachmanides, in his commentary on Deuteronomy 25:17, has one of the answers to this puzzle: "The correct interpretation (of fulfilling 'remembering Amalek' through the spoken word) appears to me that the verse states you are not to forget what Amalek did to us until we blot out his remembrance from under the heavens, and that we are to relate it to our children and our generations, saying to them, 'Thus did the wicked one do to us and therefore we have been commanded to blot out his name.' "

It appears that from time to time in the course of human history, a descendant of Amalek arises. If we do not remember Amalek we will become his victim. The Amalekite is the enemy not only of Israel but of G-d's teachings.

Rashi explains G-d's declaration of war on Amalek by pointing out that whenever Amalek is present, the human acknowlegement of G-d is diminished (his proof text is the abbreviation of G-d's throne as well as G-d's name in Exodus 17:16).

The Midrash tells us that Amalek not only attacked the weak and the stragglers who marched behind the people, but through deception was able to call out the spiritually weak Israelites from within the security of the cloud of G-d. The Amalekites deceived these weak Jews into believing there was great success and profit available outside the realm of G-d's laws; the end result was the loss of everything, including their lives.

"Remembering" as my teacher would say, means remembering the events of the past. "Not forgetting" is recognizing our own potential victimization if we abandon the ways of Hashem.

Twenty years ago, Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto initiated the first Shabbat for Syrian Jews, on the first yahrzeit of the deaths of six young Jews from Damascus who were killed trying to escape. Since that date, many congregations have commemorated Shabbat Zachor as a time of remembering these young Syrian Jews: sisters Mazal, Laura and Farah Sebbagh, their cousin Eva Saad, Nathan Shaya and Kassem Abadi, as well as the Syrian Jewish community. Today, Syrian Jewry has found its freedom; all but 150 have left for Israel and the West.

Let us all remember and never forget.

(Rabbi Ely Braun is the spiritual leader of congregation Beth Shalom in Ottawa.)

Jewish Life

'I cannot remain silent'

I am writing this article in response to my frustration at a recent event. A few months ago I attended a lecture on Judaism and Homosexuality given by a prominent Toronto rabbi.

The following is an overview of what the rabbi said at the lecture:

In Orthodox teachings and beliefs there is no such thing as a Jewish homosexual — which is news to this Jewish lesbian. Nowhere is homosexuality mentioned in Halachah (Jewish Laws); its omission proves that there are no Jewish homosexuals.

GUEST VOICES

Homosexuals are to be considered persons whose desires are in opposition to the Torah, and therefore homosexuality must be considered an abomination. We as homosexuals are deviants who have strayed from the fold. It seems that Judaism does not accept that a person is born homosexual; therefore, our behavior can and should be changed;

It is the behavior and not the person that is wrong; therefore the Jewish community should not ostracize the homosexuals, but rather should help them;

The homosexual is expected to make a sincere effort to change. This can be achieved with a proper Torah foundation and by controlling one's desires.

The heterosexual Jewish community, then, finds itself walking a fine line of condemning the homosexual act but loving the person.

I went to this lecture with an open mind, and in my trust and innocence hoped that I would be welcomed. I was the only woman who spoke. I told the rabbi I was a Jewish lesbian, and with respect, I wanted him to know that contrary to his beliefs I do not have a "genetic problem." I was shouted at by the congregation and virtually dismissed by the rabbi.

Some people have told me that although this was not a positive experience, I should find some solace in the fact that at least there is now a dialogue. As well, I was urged to appreciate that the Orthodox community is being forced to think about homosexuality. But that is no longer good enough for me. I cannot remain silent.

I find myself in an uncomfortable position where I am questioning my own religion. This is certainly not a new phenomenon, for many before me have had their own religious teachings held up to scrutiny. I am firm in my convictions, but am also concerned that my feelings will be misconstrued. We exist in a society that feeds upon hatred, anti-Semitism, intolerance and prejudice, and I do not want to feed that hatred and destruction.

I am a Jewish lesbian whose religion and spirituality is a very important aspect of my life. I was not just born Jewish; I have also come to realize the importance of Judaism in my adult life. I do not have any easy answers, just many questions and concerns and hope for the future.

There is very little dialogue or questioning, and certainly no encouragement of thought and mutual respect from the Orthodox Jewish community regarding Jewish gays and lesbians. We can no longer sit around and simply accept this behavior while countless Jewish homosexuals live a tortured closeted life, or even worse choose to commit suicide.

And what about all the Jewish gay or lesbians who have found their way out of the closet only to find that they are not welcome as their true selves in many congregations?

This problem is not exclusive to the Orthodox community. We are not welcome as "out" proud gays and lesbians in many traditional Jewish congregations. True, there are alternative congregations, but many Jewish gays and lesbians want to be an active part of the entire Jewish community.

Alternative Jewish gay and lesbian organizations are wonderful and necessary, but gays and lesbians should not have to face exclusion from the more traditional congregants solely because of their sexuality. I am not naive enough to believe that religious intolerance of homosexuality is the only issue facing the Jewish homosexual community. But it is certainly an issue, when countless Jewish homosexuals feel they must abandon their religious and spiritual roots because they believe there is no place for them.

I have great respect for rabbis and Judaism as a whole, but I cannot resign myself to accept that I must live on the margin of my own religion. We are a strong, gifted and diverse group that have so much to contribute; to lose this is nothing less than a tragedy.

I leave you wondering who I am. I am your mother, your daughter, your niece, your sister, your neighbor, your cousin; I am your friend.

Young Israeli makes impact in St. John's

By JOEL JACOBSON
Special to The CJN

HALIFAX — Efrat Tzadik saw her first snow last November at the age of 22.

"I was so excited, people laughed at me," said the young Israeli, who is spending her first winter in Canada as an "areva" in St. John's, Nfld.

She probably won't see another Newfoundland winter because she will return to Bar Ilan University next fall to complete her degree in sociology and anthropology.

The one-year experience, "living differently and seeing other things," she said, has enabled Tzadik to have a Jewish cultural impact on the small community of St. John's.

Since she arrived last Sept. 1, Tzadik has been teaching Hebrew to five children's and two adult groups per week, doing outreach programs in St. John's public schools and organizing Jewish community holiday parties.

"There were 50 people at the Chanukah party which is a lot for that size [50 synagogue members] community," she said.

"Efrat is certainly contributing," said Claire Salama, who has lived in St. John's since 1985, and is the Newfoundland representative on the Atlantic Jewish Council board. "She's not a trained teacher, but of all the teachers and shlichim we've had, she has taken the least time to get activities rolling. There are certainly no complaints from the children. They are very happy to go to Hebrew school."

Salama said Tzadik has organized women's programs and teaches adult education classes.

Tzadik, a resident of Kfar Yona near Netanya, saw an advertisement in her university newspaper for a World Union of Jewish Students program, decided it might be interesting, applied and was accepted.

"During our training, they asked what kind of community we would like to go to and I had the chance to go to Newfoundland or Connecticut. But Newfoundland was confirmed, while I would have had to do more interviews for Connecticut, with no guarantees. I took Newfoundland."

During her outreach programs, she has made presentations on Judaism, the Holocaust, Israel today and Israel of the past. "The non Jewish students don't know much about Judaism or Israel. They know the country's hot and there are camels, and I've answered questions like How long does it take to eat an ice cream in Israel?, Do you ride a camel?, What kind of clothing do you wear? and What kind of houses do you have?"

She's helped the school children understand a bit more and even guided high school students through discussions on the Mideast peace process, the development of the Jewish calendar and her two years in the Israeli army.

Arafat seen as unreliable

By MAURICE LUCOW
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Yitzhak Rabin shook hands with Yasser Arafat — a man who simply cannot deliver, said Hirsh Goodman, editor of the Jerusalem Report.

Speaking at the recent annual meeting of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, Goodman said that, as the head of a government, Arafat will neither allow elections nor permit a free press.

The Palestinians, he charged, have been preoccupied by a Palestinian diaspora from Tunis. "The kids who threw rocks during the intifadah are now in the police force," he said.

Goodman said Palestinian frustration is unbelievable because of the occupation by Arabs from outside of Gaza and the West Bank, who have no regard for the Palestinians in the territories.

He said 800,000 Palestinians are living in "abject misery" and unless they get economic benefits from the Rabin-Arafat accord, there will be no peace.

No economic development will take place in the territories until the promised foreign aid is delivered, he said, and until Arafat lets go of total authority.

As for Israel, he said, it is "a country that invented a T-shirt that says 'why be happy — worry.' "

He said there is much to worry about. There is danger in taking a bus to work or sending the kids to school "in an atmosphere of crazed lunatics who are prepared to die, to blow themselves to bits, to take you with them.

"You never know when they're coming and where they are coming from."

When Israel was at war with Arab neighbors, "we understood the situation and we could grapple with it. But the daily tension of living with this new situation makes Israel a very tense country."

Even though terrorism is a world problem of major proportions — militant Muslims have attacked in New York, London and Argentina — "we in Israel feel the insecurity," he said.

Turning to the Israel economic situation, he said the country is in great shape but "the little man on the street like me is not feeling the real benefits. Some people have become very rich ... But there is a discrepancy in the whole economic picture."

Goodman said many in Israel are critical of Rabin's leadership. "He seems confused, and constantly changes his mind."

Israel is also concerned about the increasing assimilation in the Diaspora. Goodman said his newspaper's demographics show United States Jewish population should be up to 13 million by now, in view of the heavy immigration at the turn of the century, but is only at about six million. He claimed that only 500,000 homes in the United States are "identifiably Jewish."

Romanian Jews receive needed winter clothing

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Ontario Jewish organizations are coming to the aid of Romania's Jewish population, shipping $50,000 worth of new winter clothing to the East European community.

The clothing includes boots, sweaters, overcoats and other apparel to help the estimated 14,000 mostly elderly Holocaust survivors cope with cold weather.

The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress and the women's campaign of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) cooperated in amassing the material and trucking it from Toronto to New York. There, it will be added to other clothing bound for Romania and shipped under the auspices of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

The JDC approached Jewish leaders last December to ask for their cooperation in the venture, said Congress spokesman Daniel Fine. The JDC, which provides assistance to Jewish communities in need around the world, was aware that Congress had sponsored a mission to Romania in 1990 and had maintained contacts with the community there.

Federation, Congress help out

It was also aware that Congress and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto had airlifted clothing and pharmaceuticals to Bosnia on three occasions, Fine added.

Congress approached the UJA, the Federation's fundraising arm, and the women's campaign used its contacts to locate the clothing. Congress provided the logistical support.

"The women's campaign wanted to get involved in a humanitarian effort," explained campaign associate Lissie Strauss-Sanders.

"It's a privilege to be part of this," said Joyce Eklove, co-chair of world Jewry and international affairs for Congress, Ontario region. "As community workers, this is our raison d'etre. If we don't respond, we're not doing our work."

Clothing was donated by the Adath Israel Sisterhood, Roots Canada, Gaytown Sportswear, John Strauss, Dylex, Abe Glowinsky, Avmore Shoes, David Gold, Warren Kimel and Golden Bay Sportwear.

Warehouse space was donated by Joel Greisman.

Institute for Jewish Learning revived

TORONTO — The Institute for Jewish Learning has been revived at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

A new course list will be available soon, offering programs that run from May 1 until June 15.

"The courses represent the diversity of Jewish thought," said Marlee Pinsker, the institute's new coordinator. "The Bathurst Jewish Centre is everybody's home."

Pinsker, a veteran Jewish educator, is enthusiastic about the quality of the teaching staff, who were all polled about topics they would like to cover.

Dr. David Newman, a visiting professor from Israel at York University, will be leading classes on the evolving map of the Middle East, and how boundaries could be redrawn as a result of the peace process.

Former institute instructor Selma Sage will look at the biblical, moral and historical claims of the Jewish people to the land of Israel.

Prof. Michael Mandel of York University will give a course on Jewish Music Through the Ages. Mandel is the son of Max Mandel, a Yiddish singing star in the early days of radio.

Dr. Rena Zeidman, the Chair of Jewish Studies at Queen's University in Kingston, will examine the works of Israeli author S. Y. Agnon; U of T philosophy instructor Michael Kigal will analyse the Book of Job; Toronto rabbi Avraham Plotkin will offer his insights into Jewish mysticism; Adele Reinhartz, an associate professor of Biblical Studies at McMaster University will trace the behavior of some biblical personalities; and Marlene Pinsker will teach a course on helping parents and teachers to create a Jewish world for children.

All of the courses will cost $50 for four weeks and sufficient enrolment will be required. They are open to anyone, "without prerequisites," Pinsker said.

For more information call 416-636-1880, ext. 352.

CORRECTION

The article, "Israel does not produce refugees" (CJN March 2) states: "Since 1990, Israel has absorbed over 300,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union." The correct number should have been 500,000 immigrants.

The CJN regrets its error.

25th year of Jewish studies program marked

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A dazzling array of world renowned academics joined several hundred members of the Toronto Jewish community recently to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto.

"This augurs well for the future of the program," said university chancellor Rose Wolfe.

Giving the occasion a special impetus was the establishment of a Chair of Jewish Studies, supported by the Shiff family and other benefactors, and the Shoshana Shier visiting professorship established by the Shier family.

The two gifts will establish the University of Toronto as a leading world centre for Jewish studies in the next 25 years, said program director Prof. Libby Garshowitz.

Among the celebrants were some of the 847 students who take courses in the program, like Natasha Greenberg and Adrienne Simic, who set up a display of Jewish literature with help from members of the Jewish Students Union.

"I am amazed at the strides you have made here in Jewish Studies," Montreal-born David Roskies told The CJN.

A professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary and one of the major speakers at the celebration, Roskies is an expert in the modern Jewish return to folklore and fantasy.

Rose Wolfe

A message from arts and science dean Marsha Chandler thanked the Toronto Jewish community for its generous support of the program.

The willingness of Israeli authors to confront diverse themes such as feminism, the status of Sephardi Jews and the status of women was discussed by Prof. Arnold Band, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at UCLA. He also spoke of a twin element in Jewish cultural creativity, the explosive growth of Jewish Studies programs in the United States and Canada.

An address by Prof. Isadore Twersky of Harvard University underscored the neglect of rabbinic literature, highlighting the reasons for this neglect and its intellectual consequences.

Justice Menachem Elon, an ordained rabbi who recently retired from the Supreme Court of Israel after 16 years, gave a paper on The Living Halachah: Jewish Law in Contemporary National Israeli Life.

Presiding at the sessions were William Dunphy, professor emeritus at St. Michael's College; Donald Carr, publisher of The CJN; and Rivanne Sandler of the university's Department of Middle East and Islamic Studies.

Commentaries were given by religion professor Kenneth Green, Joseph Shatzmiller of Duke University, law professor Ernest Weinrib, Garshowitz and Sharon Green, a Jewish Studies Program teacher.

Programs continue to expand

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jewish studies programs at the University of Toronto (U of T) continue to improve and expand.

York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, inaugurated six years ago, has grown quickly under its founding director, Prof. Sydney Eisen. Eisen left this position recently but will remain at the centre as coordinator of special projects.

Michael Brown, a professor in York's Division of Humanities and Hebrew, has been appointed as new director.

The centre has done much to advance the teaching and study of Judaica at York, and recently initiated the first course in Canada in Sephardic Studies. New courses this year include Jewish Law, Judaism in Canada and Canadian Jewish History. The centre offers courses in Classical Jewish Learning, Canada-Israel Relations, Holocaust Studies, Contemporary and Medieval Jewish Thought, Jewish Communal Public Policy, and Jews in Film, Sports, Recreation and Leisure.

Interdisciplinary studies are important at York, Brown said. Jewish studies are part of the overall program of religious studies and students are encouraged to combine their Jewish studies courses with courses in other fields.

The unique Jewish Teacher Education Program at York, which trains teachers for Hebrew day schools or public schools, is a two-degree program jointly offered by the Faculty of Arts and the Faculty of Education, in cooperation with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. Brown said this is the largest program for day school teacher trainees in North America.

Study at Israeli university

Along with educational methodology and Judaic studies, students receive on-the-job training; many study for a year at an Israeli university as part of their program.

Students who successfully complete the Teacher Education Program receive a bachelor of arts degree, usually with a major in Jewish studies, a bachelor of education degree, an Ontario Ministry of Education and Training certificate and certification by the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

Courses at York cover the Jewish experience from biblical times to the present day. Some courses are given in Hebrew.

The Jewish Studies Program at the U of T, created in the late 1960s, provides instruction in the various aspect of Jewish culture from antiquity to the present. It offers courses in Hebrew, Yiddish, Aramaic, Syriac and Greek, as well as literature both in the original texts and in translation, Jewish history from the biblical period to the present, and religion, philosophy and sociology.

U of T undergraduate programs prepare students for such fields as library science, the rabbinate, government and diplomatic service, teaching and Jewish communal services. The centre offers postgraduate studies in some aspects of Jewish studies.

Libby Garshowitz, director of the Jewish Studies Program and a professor in the Department of Near Eastern Studies says an increasing number of students are enrolled who have Jewish studies as their specialty.

She notes that a new course was introduced this year, The Jewish Experience, which deals with 2,000 years of Jewish history, literature and civilization.

The Jewish Studies Program is now in the process of interviewing applicants and reviewing applications for the new chair in Jewish Studies which was recently established by a gift from the J. Richard Shiff Family, as well as other donors. The chair will also become the director of the multidisciplinary Jewish Studies Program, which offers courses in a number of departments.

The recently established Shoshana Shier Distinguished Professorship will enable the university to invite an internationally recognized scholar to the program.

A new course to be offered in 1995-96 will be a one-semester fourth-level history course on Polish Jewry.

JSU director reaches young Soviet Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Rabbi Michael Skobac, 41, left Toronto at the end of January to speak at an Aish HaTorah conference in the former Soviet Union, he undertook a personal mission to locate someone to counter Christian missionaries there. In fact, he hoped to train his own counterpart to do the work he does here in his spare time.

The director of the University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union had been asked to give four three-hour seminars on Christian missionaries at an Aish HaTorah conference outside St. Petersburg.

The conference, the first of its kind, drew over 200 young Jewish adults from far-flung reaches of the republics.

One of the rabbi's most gratifying moments was his meeting with a Russian Jewish student who had left Christianity after hearing a Russian translation of one of his audiotapes on countering Christian missionaries.

Rabbi Skobac had visited the Soviet Union only once before, in 1990, as director of the New York-area branch of the counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism. He and four others met with Jewish community leaders in Moscow, Kiev and Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) to inform them about the tactics of Christian missionaries targeting Jews for conversion in the Soviet Union.

Their efforts had "a limited impact," he said, partly because many of the leaders they trained emigrated soon after.

Christian missionaries today pose "a tremendous problem" in the former Soviet Union, said the rabbi during a recent interview.

Last May, in Moscow alone, over 5,000 Jews converted to Christianity at a messianic Jewish festival organized by Hear O Israel Ministries, an American group, said the rabbi. Five hundred Jews attended the first meeting for the resulting Hebrew Christian congregation, and subsequent festivals were held in Minsk and Kiev.

American-organized Christian festivals are heavily advertised and offer tempting freebies such as T-shirts, food, comradeship and entertainment, Rabbi Skobac said. "A lot look at it just as a good time, but they open the door to these people, and a lot of [the Jews] are spiritually starved."

The task Rabbi Skobac set for himself this year was daunting. To find at least one English-speaking person with good interpersonal skills and a strong Jewish background who could spend a minimum of 10 hours a day with him during his week-long stay — and who wasn't planning to emigrate imminently — was "an extremely arduous process."

Three weeks of trans-Atlantic phone calls in the wee hours yielded no solid leads, but shortly after his arrival at the conference, Rabbi Skobac's luck turned.

He was directed to a St. Petersburg psychotherapist whose name Rabbi Skobac prefers not be made public. The man is in his mid-30s and has been religiously committed for over 10 years. To Rabbi Skobac's delight, he already had an interest in "responding to the missionary threat" and had taught himself a great deal about Christianity.

"He was almost someone waiting for this to happen," said Rabbi Skobac enthusiastically.

The two men spent 10 to 12 hours a day studying reams of material, including a set of 12 tapes on How to Answer a Christian Missionary prepared by Rabbi Skobac for Jews for Judaism in 1990.

Rabbi Skobac hopes his protege will be able to train others to help him deal effectively with the formidable geographic area involved.

Even in North America, there are only about half a dozen people experienced in counselling Jews who have converted to Christianity, said Rabbi Skobac. In Canada, he and Julius Ciss, director of the Toronto-based Jews for Judaism, are the only two.

Rabbi Michael Skobac discusses Christian missionaries with students from the former Soviet Union at an Aish HaTorah conference held last month near St. Petersburg.

"Typically, most rabbis know very little about Christianity, and it's difficult to communicate with someone unless you know what they believe," said Rabbi Skobac, a graduate of Yeshiva University who has studied the issue for the past 20 years.

His own interest was sparked when, as a student at Illinois' Northwestern University who had a nascent interest in Judaism, he felt "deceived" after going to a "Torah study" session which turned out to be run by Christian missionaries.

The purpose of counter-missionary work is to explain how Christianity is not consistent with Judaism, Rabbi Skobac said. He expects that the psychotherapist will adapt some of his educational and counselling materials to better serve the Jewish community in the former Soviet Union.

"I really felt that I left something there that will be able to be effective."

Himel remains optimistic about prospects for peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite recent violence in Israel, including the January suicide bombing at Beit Lid which killed 21 Israelis, television journalist Martin Himel, 39, is decidedly optimistic about the prospect of peace in the Middle East.

He likens the peace process to a marriage, cautioning that "to make a marriage work...involves compromise and understanding."

Hope of a better life is the antidote to Islamic fundamentalism, he believes. "If people in Gaza are given hope, then the fundamentalists will have a much more difficult time convincing people to blow themselves up," he told an audience of over 300 last week.

Benefits of the peace process are already visible, new business deals with Arab countries and Israeli tourism to Jordan being two examples, Himel said.

The Toronto-born Tel Aviv bureau chief for Baton Broadcasting was in Toronto to speak at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue at an event co-sponsored by the CHAT Alumni Association and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, New Leadership division.

He is an alumnus of both the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and the Hebrew University, where he received a BA in Economics and International Relations in 1978.

The university also served as his introduction to Arab perceptions of Israel. Initially astounded to hear Arab students call Israel a police state, he participated in heated student dialogues which "raised a lot of question marks" about the complexity of the political situation.

As a Middle East correspondent since 1980, including a 10-year stint for CTV, Himel has witnessed and reported on a broad spectrum of events including the Lebanon Civil War, the intifadah, the Persian Gulf War, and the PLO-Israel peace talks.

He has not participated on any one side, such as serving in the Israeli army, he noted. Not having made aliyah "in an official sense," his status is that of a Canadian journalist working in Israel. His wife, Inna Shapiro, is an Israeli journalist who made aliyah from the former Soviet Union almost 20 years ago. Their children are Israeli.

Martin Himel

Does Himel have to work at being objective? "Always," he told The CJN in an interview. "I don't believe there's such a thing as complete objectivity, but you try to get at it.

"I've taken a lot of flak from audiences and editors," he said. "People are people. We're not perfect. [I've seen media] anti-Israel bias and anti-Palestinian bias. I've gotten letters calling me a self-hating Jew and letters calling me a Zionist agent."

While he strives for journalistic objectivity, Himel admits to having been touched emotionally by the Washington signing ceremony between Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and King Hussein of Jordan, both of whom he had covered on previous occasions. "Both men have been through so much turmoil. It took a lot of guts for everybody to make that moment happen."

Rabin is the first name to come to mind when Himel is asked who he most admires. "He's a real human being. When soldiers are killed, he takes it very personally. He can be difficult and autocratic, but he has very few facades. I respect him."

Even if the right-wing Likud party forms the next Israeli government, Himel is convinced that the peace process will continue. "There is no other choice," he said.

"Palestinians know that if they play their cards right, East Jerusalem will be their capitol, provided they come to terms with...living with the shidduch partner," Himel said in his speech. "I'm not saying this will happen today or tomorrow, but the change in atmosphere could definitely lead to that situation. It may sound outrageous today . . . that's peaceful co-existence. Israelis want not to have to look over their shoulders every minute."

He added that changes wouldn't be made "at the price of self-extinction" and noted that East Jerusalem, although under Israeli control, is a separate entity from the rest of the city with a distinctive Palestinian character.

To achieve real peace, Himel believes it will take "patience, hope, and a desire from both sides to really work at it."

Book to mark liberation

TORONTO — A special souvenir remembrance book is currently in production to honor the 50th anniversary of liberation and Holocaust remembrance — a community commemoration.

The committee compiling the data to commemorate the 50th anniversary requires photos representing Jewish family life cycle events which took place during the period from the liberation of Auschwitz to the establishment of the State of Israel. These events include weddings, brit milah, bar mitzvah celebrations and holiday photos taken from January 1945 to May 1948.

The deadline for photo submission is March 15. The committee will decide which photos will be used for the souvenir remembrance book. All photos submitted will be returned.

The book will include personal messages in memory of loved ones or communities that perished during the Holocaust, a liberation section allowing an opportunity for people to find and reunite with other survivors, archival photos, and other pertinent information.

For more information, please contact Pnina Zilberman, Holocaust Remembrance Committee at 416-635-2883 ext. 144.

Toronto teens to play hockey for Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ten Toronto teens, equipment bags in tow, recently boarded a jetliner en route to a hockey tournament in Lithuania.

The 10 are expected to form the nucleus of Israel's national junior team playing in its first-ever international junior competition.

Sponsored by the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF), the tournament is geared for developing teams in the hockey world, along with the host Lithuanians. Israel will compete with the likes of Lithuania, Turkey and Croatia in the IIHF's C pool, Group 2 while Group 1 includes "Yugoslavia," the Netherlands and Bulgaria.

The infusion of Canadian-based talent onto the 22-man Israeli roster is designed to give the team some credibility, said Oded Orgil, one of two representatives of the team for North America.

It will make the team more competitive and enhance the learning experience for the Israeli-based skaters, he said.

Orgil, a member of Israel's senior national team, said all the Canadian-based boys are eligible to play because they either hold an Israeli passport or have a parent born in the Jewish State.

Most of the Canadian ringers are of Midget AA calibre, though two play in AAA leagues, he said. They were selected after several tryout camps were held in the Toronto area. Orgil said greater effort will be made next year to expand the talent base to other Canadian and American cities.

The Canadian contingent departed on March 1 for Birstanas, about 100 kilometres from the Lithuanian capital of Vilnius, where they will meet their teammates from Israel and practise in a pre-tournament camp. After eight days of training, they will head for the town of Elektranai where the tournament will be held from March 11 to 17.

Most of the Israeli-based team is made up of Sabras, supplemented by four or five Russian-born players, Orgil said. They will be coached by Toronto-born oleh Mike Rubin and Mark Talesnick, a native of Kingston, Ont.

It's expected the team will play Canadian-style hockey, Orgil said. That doesn't necessarily mean they'll try to run the European opposition, but at an average size of 5 foot 10 and 170-175 pounds, "they're not going to be manhandled."

Making the trip from Canada are Ran Oz, 17, a Sabra skater who has played with Israel's senior national team and who is now playing with the Toronto Midget Marlies. At over 6 feet tall and about 220 lbs., Oz is expected to anchor the defence.

Others on the team include centre Yaron Orgil, 16; rightwing Mark Joseph, 17; goalie Avi Gleeck, 17; defenceman Jason Shiff, 17; defenceman Simon Levine, 16; centre Brian Friedman, 15; defenceman Ronnie Kuperberg, 16; winger Ely Oosterhuis, 17; and defenceman Jason Goldberg, 17.

Moti Orgil, Oded's father, will accompany the team as equipment manager.

For Goldberg, playing for Israel is turning into an unexpected bonus this hockey season.

"I always had a strong feeling for Israel," the Grade 12 CHAT student said. "To play for your country is not something everybody can do. This is a once in a lifetime experience, something that people can only dream about doing."

Clad in their blue-and-white warm-up suits, the Toronto-based segment of the Israeli national junior hockey team prepares to fly to Lithuania for a tournament. Seen here are (top row, from left) Oded Orgil, Jason Shiff, Avi Gleeck, Ran Oz, Ely Oosterhuis, Moti Orgil; (bottom row, from left) Brian Friedman, Jason Goldberg, Mark Joseph, Yaron Orgil and Simon Levine.

Goldberg, five foot 11, 165 lbs., said he learned about the tournament in December when his coach with the Thornhill Selects, Sam Joseph told him that Israel was looking for skaters.

He made the cut after the first evaluation session and worked his way onto the team after the second.

A self-styled "heads-up defenceman" who can move the puck and rack up his share of assists, Goldberg said he's not sure what to expect in international competition played on the larger European rinks. But he says he's looking forward to donning Israel's colors and making new friends in Lithuania.

Byzas garden of culinary delights now includes brunch

If brunch in the garden appeals to you, you may well want to investigate Byzas (pronounced "Bee-zas", short for Byzantium), where John and Dean Kekkas, those indefatigable restauranteurs-par-excellence of Christina's fame, have started a reverse phenomenon: putting the garden into brunch.

CEOs love Byzas' spacious booths for private and discreet business lunches. For information and reservations, call (416) 778-1100.

The subtle touches of greenery and refinement that floriate Byzas' dinner menu are also in evidence in the Saturday and Sunday brunch the Kekkas brothers have introduced to accommodate their growing clientele.

Particularly popular among business and professional people, the dining room is flanked by booths and benches which allow formal and informal meetings to be conducted in complete privacy, while still affording a view of the entire dining room and the bustling Danforth outside. Indeed, so much business is now conducted in the dining room that Dean has advised his waiters to make sure they're "picking up menus and not somebody's legal contract." But those who prefer to leave the office at the office need not worry, for here you'll be served not with papers but with the most exquisite and fanciful Greek/Mediterranean fare imaginable.

The menu does a madcap hopscotch across sunny southern Europe, with pit stops in Italy (for fabulous pasta and pizzas), Greece (for melt-in-your mouth rack of lamb and "Greek" salads with a deliciously atypical twist), and France (for edible flowers and herbs to add colour and flavour to your love affair with food). Add a quick dash to the middle East (for hoummos, baba ghannouj and pita) and a jumbo jet ride to the American midwest (for Black Angus striploin), and you have the ingredients for a highly pleasurable soirée.

The menu boasts a proliferation of organically grown greens, and the "green" theme extends to the water used to prepare your food and poured into your glasses: it's "absolutely, 100 percent" pure due to Byzas' reverse osmosis filtration system — a Toronto first, according to Kekkas. (In order to be the "last word" on the Toronto dining scene, you need a lot of "firsts", and Byzas has them in spades).

Ideal for special occasions, the restaurant seats up to 200 people and provides a striking setting for wedding receptions, bar mitzvah parties and the like. Indeed, from the moment you enter you're enveloped by an extraordinary ambience that starts with the massive terrocotta mural designed by South African Jewish artist Lynn Fisher and continues into the main dining room, where white-linenned tables dot a vast honey-coloured floor trimmed in molasses brown, with sculptured okra walls and ceilings propped by rust-coloured romanesque columns.

From Thursday to Saturday you'll be serenaded by a violinist, guitarist and accordianist; at other times, the state-of-the-art sound system will bathe your auditory senses in Dr. Zhivago, Fiddler on the Roof and other favourite strains. Both the live and recorded music are kept at soothing levels.

World-class cuisine, reasonable prices

Though Byzas goes to the head of the class in appearance and culinary excellence, prices are considerably less than at many other outstanding restaurants. A full dinner for two with appetizer, main course, dessert and a couple of glasses of wine from their extensive wine list can run you well under $100 including taxes and tip, but for as little as $7.95 you can order a pizza that's a complete meal in itself. At this price, you'll find the portion you're given dwarfs that offered in many other popular eateries, while conceding absolutely nothing in imagination, taste, and freshness. "Freshness is an absolute", says Dean. "No MSG, no chemicals, no preservatives, no frozen prepared foods. All our sauces are made from scratch." Armed with this mandate of freshness, creativity (which Leif Kravis and Gustavo Maurelli spare no pains in ensuring that your meal lives up to expectations.

The freshness fanaticism extends to the desserts, which are prepared daily on the premises (with the exception of the ices and ice creams) by Pasty Chef Cassandra Bateman. If the regular menu spoils you, the dessert menu will positively ruin you. Anyone counting calories is well advised to steer clear of the dessert menu entirely, for once you're eye-deep in Chocolate Torte, Crème brulée, and Tiramisu, you're "done like dessert." The Tarte tatin (a carmelized upside down apple tart with dark rum crème Anglaise and warm caramel sauce) is absolutely divine and does contain a few calories, but who's counting? For a few less calories but an equally potent punch, try the Pears Poached in Red Wine with spiced Red Wine Sauce and Honeyed Mascarpone Cheese.

Not just your basic brunch

The Saturday and Sunday brunch offers generous portions of your traditional favourites served with the same elegance and panache that characterizes the dinner menu. "Just because it's breakfast is no reason to skimp on presentation", says Dean. From Eggs Benedict to Eggs Kiev to Eggs Byzas (poached eggs on a pita with grilled eggplant and a fresh basil Hollandaise) to steak and eggs, all brunch dishes are served with roast new potatoes and a mixed green salad. If you just want a bagel with lox and/or cream cheese, you'll find that fresh and delicious too. Side orders include lamb sausage, Italian sausage, toasted English muffins, and other scrumptious fare.

Byzas is open seven days a week, Sun.–Thurs. 11:30 a.m. to 11:30 p.m., Fri. and Sat. 11:30 a.m. to 1 a.m. Lunch is served daily from 11:30 a.m. to 4 p.m., dinner from 4:30 p.m. Saturday and Sunday brunch is served from 11:30 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Kimelman joins Canadian hockey teachers in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian contingent of instructors in Metulla's Canada Centre recreational complex has grown to five, enough to ice a line and take on the Israeli junior team in a recent hockey scrimmage.

Jason Kimelman, David Reine and Jeremy Blumes have recently joined Kitchener-Waterloo native Jeff Budd and Torontonian Jonathan Graff as on-ice instructors at the wildly popular northern Israel hockey rink built with the financial help of Canadian Jews through the United Israel Appeal.

The young men recently teamed up long enough to administer an 8-0 drubbing to about half of the Israeli-based national junior squad prior to the team's departure for Lithuania. The tournament there will mark Israel's debut in international junior competition.

In Metulla, the Canadians spend much of their day teaching Israeli kids the how-to's of skating and hockey.

Kimelman, 19, had been in Metulla only about a week when he spoke to The CJN by telephone, but already he was raving about his time there. "It's the greatest experience I've ever had," he said.

On the ice at 10 a.m. and sometimes not off until 11:30 p.m., Kimelman, Reine and Blumes teach the Sabras everything from lacing up their skates to the functions of all that bulky hockey equipment.

The three young Canadians live rent-free in an apartment inside Canada Centre. They get a modest monthly allowance for living expenses.

Kimelman said he learned of the volunteer program through his uncle, Louis Reznick, who visited Metulla two years ago and met Mayor Yossi Goldberg. Best friend Reine came with him.

Jason's mother, Linda, admits to being concerned about her son's stay in Israel. It was four and a half years ago that daughter Marnie was killed on a Tel Aviv beach by a terrorist pipe bomb.

"I'm very happy for Jason. I'm not so happy for myself but I think it's [important] to put his feelings first," she said.

"It was courageous for him to go. It took him a long time to decide to go to that place. He was very ready, very passionate about going.

"It was important to Marnie. She loved being there and going there ... I think it's part of his healing process. I think he'll come to some form of peace there."

As for Jason, he says he doesn't feel in danger. "I'm having the time of my life. This place is amazing. They treat us so well. It's just great."

Reine echoes many of those sentiments. Reine and Kimelman played for York Mills High School's hockey team for three years. Before that, they skated for MTHL squads.

Now they're helping first-time skaters and seeing them improve. "It's a good feeling helping out," Reine said.

Blumes, a Calgary native, came to Metulla after completing a kibbutz ulpan program that began in September. Last fall he learned Israel had five mini-rinks. Eventually he heard about Canada Centre, contacted Budd, visited the rink and decided to stay on as a volunteer.

The boys' tour of duty ends in May.

Singles Registry "Guarantees" Results

There's always something new and exciting happening at the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. This month is no exception for the community based Jewish organization, which offers its members the easiest way for Jewish singles to enter the dating scene. In just two short years, the Registry has soared to the top of the pack in Toronto as the city's largest Jewish singles dating service with over 650 members.

"MAZEL TOV" were the words of the month as three Registry couples recently celebrated their weddings, reported Rob Singer the Registry's director. "Our goal is to have a wedding a month and with thirty three couples dating steadily at the moment, we hope to reach that illusive plateau in the very near future."

What makes the Jewish Singles Registry so attractive is its pro-active approach to dating. In most services you have to wait for the service to try and match you up. At the Registry you do the choosing, and with hundreds of files (including photographs) at your fingertips you make the service work for you.

The success rate of the Registry has been so phenomenal, that members are now being offered a "guaranteed" service policy. In the event that a member has not received a minimum of six potential dates within the first year of membership, the Registry agrees to waive a member's second year renewal fee for a period of up to twelve months from the expiry of the his/her first year's registration, or until the member has received six potential dates. THERE IS VIRTUALLY NO RISK IN JOINING THE JEWISH SINGLES REG-ISTRY OF TORONTO. You can contact the Registry office for more details.

For friends and family who wish to invest in a loved one's romantic future then the Registry gift certificate program is for you. Gift certificates are available in denominations of $50 and $100 and are redeemable for new or existing memberships. Now you can take a direct approach and give the "perfect" gift to someone you love.

When it comes to meeting people the Jewish Singles Registry is in a class by itself. Whether it be for friendship, a relationship, or even marriage, now is the perfect time to give them a call and to become part of Toronto's largest Jewish dating service. For more information or to become a member please call 416-398-7068.

Looking for "the right one"?

Unlike any other dating service, The Jewish Singles Registry offers an unlimited number of introductions that you alone select from our extensive bio/photo library.

Call today, because if you are looking for "the right one," The Jewish Singles Registry is it.

Living Realty Inc. presents your dream home

Living Realty Inc., one of the largest privately-owned realtor in Canada, has been operating in Toronto for more than fifteen years. With close to 1,000 employees and sales representatives, it has six branches throughout Toronto and one in Hong Kong. It's expansion plans include branching into Vancouver sometime in the near future.

Prices of Toronto real estate, be they commercial, residential or investment properties, continued to remain attractive to overseas buyers. Because Living Realty Inc. has had a solid reputation among this buyer group, it was able to help bring in much investment capital to Toronto.

Currently, Living Realty Inc. is featuring a magnificent home at 33 Wentworth Ave., North York. Situated on a 140' x 314' acre lot, this home backs onto the scenic Don River ravine. With 12,000 square feet of living space plus a totally finished lower level, it would particularly suit anyone who likes to entertain on a grand scale.

This home is in a quiet residential neighborhood, yet is only steps from the North York business corridor. It is only minutes away from shopping centres, subway entrances and bus depots, entertainment facilities such as the North York Centre of Performing Arts, and recreational facilities such as the Douglas Snow Aquatic Centre. Schools and synagogues are also closeby.

The building structure is concrete, clad with marble on the exterior. The front of the house boasts a street-front fountain and a three-car tandem garage, while the rear of the house is decked out with a huge oval-shaped terrace overlooking the ravine. Along with many features too numerous to describe, there is a spectacular indoor pool and a complete entertainment floor.

For a limited time only, the vendors are willing to include most of the existing furnishings in its newly reduced asking price.

To view this fine home, or to find out how Living Realty Inc. can help you, call Linda Chan at (905) 474-1772.

The Residences of Teefy Point

Teefy Point is a small, exclusive development in a special setting, for people who want privacy, style and custom design.

This Custom Townhome Project consists of a row of 4 units and a row of 8 units, forming an L-shape on a private lane running east from Bathurst St. West of this lane is a conservation-area ravine; to the east are high-value properties.

Located just 1 km north of Highway 7, and next door to the Richmond Hill Country Club, the Residences of Teefy Point combine easy access to the city with privacy in a park-like setting. Evergreens in the ravine provide year-round greenery. The landscape plan calls for extensive planting of large trees; the berm at the entrance to Teefy Point will also be planted with trees.

The landscaped gardens at the rear are private and enclosed, and open on to the ravine. Ideal for a family, this development includes a play area for children, visitor parking, and two wheelchair-accessible parking spaces.

These Residences are attached condominium townhouses in neo-classical Georgian style, with 12-inch cornice moulding to accent the roofline, extensive trim, porticoes and wrought-iron railings in front. Each house is 2,800 square feet, on three levels, with the Georgian style maintained inside as well as out.

The ground floor has a two-car garage in front, a powder room, and a "great room" with 8'6" ceilings which opens on to the garden in the rear. The main floor has a living and dining room with 10' ceiling, and a sunken kitchen and family room with an 11'9" ceiling. On the second floor are three bedrooms with 9' ceilings, and two baths. Staircases are open, adding to the spaciousness of the design.

Noise transfer between houses is greatly reduced by 2" separation betwen all demizing walls and floor structure on all levels, and by the use of "silent floor" truss joist framing on the first and second floors.

There are three basic house plans. The builder, Alan D. Gordon Design-Build, will also sit down with the purchaser and custom design any aspect of the interior from walls and bathrooms through to finishes and tiles, with the changes invoiced to the purchaser at builder's cost.

For more information on the Residences of Teefy Point, call (905) 709-0880 anytime, and ask for David Sandness. David is on the site Saturday and Sunday from noon to 4:00 p.m., and Monday to Wednesday from 1:00 to 6:00 p.m.

Enhancing the Dignity of Woman

Etty Pipel, Na'Amaat Attorney

HANA'S STORY

"When my husband died, he was only 25 years old and our children were both under the age of three. We had been in Israel less than a year and I had no family here to turn to. I don't know what I would have done without Etty, the lawyer that Na'amat provided free of charge. She found that the mortgage on our new home had an insurance clause that paid it off in case of death. She secured title to our family bank acount and property for me – quite a complicated process. Etty has been more than my lawyer. She is my friend and my support."

Na'amat has over thirty legal aid offices throughout Israel, staffed with lawyers who provide free legal services to women. Typical clients are widows with financial or estate problems, single mothers, abused women, divorcees with child custody problems and women seeking a Get (a Jewish divorce).

Na'amat's legal department also drafts legislative proposals dealing with the status of women and their legal rights.

Typical costs to Na'amat to provide services:

$380. pays for the opening submission to the Rabbinical Court on behalf of an Aguna (women who has been refused a Get).
$250. pays for one day in court on behalf of a legal aid recipient.
$180. pays for legal service for a child custody hearing.
$ 50. pays for one hour of legal consultation.

Jewish social worker wins Yukon dog sled race

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

WHITEHORSE, Yukon — A former Jewish Toronto social worker who has been living here for almost 18 years won the recent annual 1,000-mile Yukon Quest dog sled race from Whitehorse to Fairbanks, Alaska. The prize is $15,000 US.

Frank Turner, 47, broke all records for the race, making the gruelling trip in 10 days and 16 hours, beating the previous record set in 1991 by five hours, and coming in ahead of this year's runner-up by 50 minutes.

Frank is the son of Andy and Peggy Turner of Victoria. He works in Whitehorse as manager of social development for several First Nations bands. His wife Anne, who teaches at Whitehorse College, is also formerly from Toronto. They have two daughters, a son and a granddaughter.

Turner raises and races dogs as a side line and has 38 dogs, mainly Siberian Alaskan Huskies. He ended the race with 12 of the 14 dogs he started with for the long trek.

Rules of the race require the mushers, as they are known, to have at least six dogs at the finish line in Fairbanks. Often dogs are too tired to complete the trip, but most of Frank's 55-pound Huskies came through in great shape, he reported.

Shortly after arriving in Fairbanks at 4:40 a.m., Frank phoned his parents in Victoria to tell them excitedly that "I'm the first Jewish guy ever to win the race."

Anne, reached by phone in Fairbanks by The CJN, accompanied her husband, driving a "dog box" motor home, which she described as "a little hotel" complete with a booth for each dog, plus food and cooking utensils to feed the animals and themselves. The Turners slept in sleeping bags, despite the 50 to 60 degrees below zero weather "and we loved every minute of it." She said the dogs run best at 20 to 30 below.

The rules required that only Frank could drive the sled and they moved along the snow-packed road at about 12 miles per hour. A 36-hour layover midway was mandatory, and there were three other short breaks. "These were for the benefit of the dogs, not necessarily for the musher," Anne pointed out. Frank often ate while he was mushing.

This was the 12th Yukon Quest and Frank has entered every one, finally winning this year. He told the Whitehorse Star newspaper: "This was the only year I thought, with the dogs I had, that winning might be in the cards. Winning has never been a motivation for me. It's never been a personal goal."

He added that "I truly enjoy being out there with the dogs and the relationship you have as part of a team. It's the mutual dependency that's special. You depend on the dogs to get from one place to another and the dogs are dependent on you to take care of them, feed them and not run them too long — and massage their shoulders if they're sore."

Many mushers thought Turner and his dogs were "too nice" to win the tough race. Anne said this was because "Frank babies the dogs too much. He takes very good care of them."

Contestants leave Whitehorse at two-minute intervals and each is clocked to determine the winner. Turner raced on the old Klondike and Alaska highways, sometimes using other roads. Yukon Rangers and their counterparts in Alaska break the trail so the contestants can't get stuck in snowdrifts.

Anne told The CJN that although the prize money is substantial, the race cost them between $14,000 and $20,000. However, they were helped by some local sponsors.

Asked about Jewish life in Whitehorse, Anne said there are a few Jewish families here in business and in the professions, and they get together for the High Holy Days and other Jewish occasions. But there is no synagogue or community centre.

The Yukon Territory is part of the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region but Congress does not have a record of the Jews who live there.

Vancouver Negev Dinner set

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

Naomi and Dennis Frankenburg

VANCOUVER — Dennis and Naomi Frankenburg, one of Vancouver's most respected couples, will be the honorees of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) annual Negev Dinner, to be held April 25 at the Hyatt Regency Hotel.

The guest speaker will be Canadian Maj.-Gen. Lewis MacKenzie, who was chief of staff of United Nations troops in the former Yugoslavia from 1992 to '93.

Born in England, the Frankenburgs married in 1947. Four of their children were born in Manchester; the fifth was born here after the family emigrated in 1959.

Two sons are Israeli citizens and fought in Israel's wars; the eldest of the Frankenburgs' 11 grandchildren will soon join the Israeli army. The couple frequently visit Jerusalem, where they have an apartment.

Since their arrival in Canada, Dennis and Naomi have been actively involved in the community, at both local and national levels.

They have long been supporters of the JNF. Dennis was president of the Vancouver Division and has served on the national board; Naomi is currently national vice-president.

Naomi has also devoted much time and effort to Hadassah-WIZO. In 1991, she was responsible for bringing the national Hadassah-WIZO conference to Vancouver for the first time.

Proceeds from the dinner will support the JNF's Tirat Zvi reservoir in the Beit Shean Valley in Israel. Built in 1992 near the kibbutz of the same name, the reservoir extends over 25 acres and has a capacity of 132 million gallons. The water is used for irrigation and fish cultivation, which, according to JNF, is the kibbutz's most profitable industry.

Israeli figure skater's story to air on CBC

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Dale Burshtein attended the 1992 Winter Olympics in Lillehammer, Norway, she and those around her were charmed by Israeli figure skater Michael (Misha) Shmerkin.

At the opening ceremonies he was a one-man team carrying the flag of a country with a climate better suited for summer shorts than winter sports. Later, in competition, Shmerkin delighted the audience with his humor and ability.

Burshtein, a CTV producer at the Olympics, thought Shmerkin's story would make great TV. Now, three years later and working with Insight Production Company, she's put Shmerkin's story on film. His story will air on CBC on Monday, March 13 on the magazine-style program Skate.

To compile the five-mintue segment, Burshtein travelled to Metulla, Jerusalem and Germany. It was in the Canada Centre in Metulla, on Israel's border with Lebanon, that Shmerkin's near-moribund career got a kick start.

A native of the Soviet Union, Shmerkin, 24, and his family made aliyah in 1991. In a land of palm trees and sandy beaches, Shmerkin thought his skating career was over.

As a youth, he was one the best young skaters in the Soviet Union. As he got older and better, he ran into a glass ceiling above which anti-Semitic bureaucrats would not let him rise.

To further his career, Misha's mother even went through a phony marriage ceremony to an ethnic Russian in the hopes her son would no longer be considered a Jew.

Living in Israel, Shmerkin approached Metulla Mayor Yossi Goldberg and convinced him to back his efforts to represent Israel in international competitions.

Married on the ice

Skating is so much a part of his life that Shmerkin even got married on the ice at Canada Centre. Combining tradition with his avocation, he smashed the empty wine glass with his skates.

Burshtein also filmed at the Western Wall, where Shmerkin once placed a note asking God to allow him to represent Israel at the Olympics. And she followed him to Oberstdorf, Germany, where he trained for the upcoming world championships.

Misha Shmerkin

Burshtein said Shmerkin's story will fit nicely with Skate's format of personality profiles and behind-the-scenes looks at the world of figure skating. His story has universal appeal and Shmerkin himself "captures the support of just about anybody who meets him. His story is about heritage and deep roots in Jewish culture. His dedication, modesty and charm appeal to everyone," she said.

In addition to her Skate profile of Shmerkin, Burshtein, a native of Winnipeg, is preparing a 15-minute "presentation video" for the United Israel Appeal (UIA). Canada Centre, Shmerkin's home rink, was constructed with contributions from Canadian Jews sent by the UIA.

The UIA arranged financing for Burshtein's venture with Jay Firestone, a former vice-chair of Alliance Film, underwriting much of the cost. Lufthansa provided free transportation.

UIA president Gerry Halbert said last year Metulla, with a population of 6,000, hosted 500,000 visitors, most of them attracted to Canada Centre.

Palestinians want pre-1948 land back

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Palestinians do not recognize the 1917 Balfour Declaration that favored a Jewish homeland or the 1947 partition plan, and demand the right to return to land they consider conquered.

Those are the main points of an official booklet produced by the Palestinian Authority (PA)'s Information Ministry entitled Palestinian Refugees and the Right of Return.

Likud Knesset member Ze'ev Begin distributed the English-language booklet to MKs last Tuesday, a week after he disclosed a similar booklet on Jewish immigration.

Begin called on Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to shut down the ministry, which operates in Ramallah in contravention of the Oslo agreement restricting PA offices to Jericho or Gaza.

"The 1947 resolution on the partition of Palestine came only to complement the unjust laws and military orders enacted by the British Mandate government. The Palestinian people didn't accept the Balfour Declaration at any time," the booklet says.

Meanwhile, the foreign ministers of Israel, Egypt and Jordan and a PA official are to convene this week to discuss those Palestinians who fled the territories after the 1967 war.

The March 7 meeting is to take place in Amman.

The Israeli embassy in Amman confirmed that Foreign Minister Shimon Peres would be taking part in the talks, which will address the fate of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians who fled their homes in the West Bank and Gaza Strip after the Six-Day War. Discussions on Palestinian refugees from the 1948 war are not scheduled.

The meeting will be the first of its kind since the signing of the Oslo accord. In that agreement, Israel agreed to discuss Palestinian refugees from 1967, but did not commit to how many it would allow to return, or when.

Syria on U.S. drug list

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Despite Syrian requests for leniency, the Clinton administration is continuing to punish Damascus for manufacturing and exporting illicit drugs.

As expected, the U.S. State Department's annual report on drugs lists Syria as one of five states not in compliance with United Nations treaties banning narcotics.

The International Narcotics Control Strategy Report was released here last Wednesday.

States on the list are immediately cut off from most categories of U.S. assistance, including foreign aid, according to Robert Gelbard, the assistant secretary of state for international narcotics and law enforcement.

In addition, the United States must vote against any loans to the country from multilateral development banks, Gelbard said.

In Syria's case, the move is largely symbolic because it receives no U.S. assistance or aid of any kind.

The other four countries on the list, which also were denied certification last year, are Afghanistan, Iran, Nigeria and Myanmar, formerly Burma.

Lebanon, also known for exporting drugs, received a more sympathetic assessment. The administration granted Lebanon a "vital national interest" waiver, keeping it off the list despite its role in heroin production.

Syria had asked for a similar waiver during bilateral talks with the United States last year, said White House spokesperson Michael McCurry.

The Syrians "felt that what they had done to control poppy cultivation warranted a certification," McCurry said. "Our view was that there were additional steps the government of Syria could take to control heroin production in areas in which Syria either influences or controls."

The State Department also expressed reservations about Syria's cooperation with drug producers.

Although the Syrian army has taken some measures to control production in areas under its control, such as the Bekaa Valley in Lebanon, the efforts fell short, said the State Department report.

Blame cast for missing Arad

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — "Arab culture" and the refusal by Western countries to use economic influence against Iran are preventing the return of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad, Israel's deputy defence minister told the Knesset last Wednesday.

Mordechai Gur was responding to questions on German press reports of new evidence that Arad is being held in Iran [CJN, March 2].

He denied that Israel has received any new information on Arad, whose jet was shot down over Lebanon in October 1986, but said the government believes he is alive.

"There are two main obstacles to achieving results. One is found in the internal, Arab, Persian, Muslim culture which is less sensitive to human lives and is prepared to play with them," Gur said.

Gur said there is also a problem at the international level, where "large countries with flourishing economies are not prepared to use their influence in this direction. It is also almost impossible to get the Western world to put a real embargo on Iran."

He said all information on the matter, no matter its source, is being checked.

Earlier last week, a senior German envoy brought no new information on Arad to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Chancellor Helmut Kohl's foreign policy adviser, Joachim Betterlich, met with Rabin to plan Kohl's June visit here, but Arad's fate was also discussed.

German officials have made clear that Arad is the subject of a German-Iranian dialogue.

Senior Israeli officials have voiced displeasure that Bonn agreed last year to a major rescheduling of Iranian debt, charging the move eased the economic crisis in Iran.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 27:

• The press reported that Israeli, Palestinian and U.S. officials held a special meeting in Jerusalem to discuss the establishment of seven to nine industrial parks in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

• Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin met with Tawfik Catili, a judge of the Nazareth District Court, to discuss the latter's candidacy as Israel's Ambassador to Finland.

Feb. 28:

• Israel and the PLO formally requested Norway to organize a roster of international observers to monitor elections in the territories. The press in Norway reported that a "force" of approximately 400 persons would be necessary.

Mar. 1:

• The IDF and the South Lebanese Army attacked a Hezbollah stronghold; three Hezbollah fighters were killed.

• The identity of the former head of the General Security Services was disclosed to the Israeli public upon completion today of his term of office. He is Yaacov Peri.

Mar. 2:

• Prime Minister Rabin turned 73 years old today.

• CNN reported that Israel and Syria were making progress in peace negotiations based upon the concepts of fully demilitarized zones in the Golan and the exchange of ambassadors. Both Israel and Syria denied the reports.

• The Temple Mount was closed to tourists until Sunday morning as a precaution during the celebration of Id al-Fitr, the holiday marking the end of the month of Ramadan. The Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron was closed to tourists until Friday afternoon.

Mar. 3:

• President Weizman travelled throughout the north of Israel visiting Arab villages in honor of Id al-Fitr.

• Former Chief of Staff Ehud Barak officially resigned from the army today thus enabling him to enter government as early as June. When asked whether he intended to pursue politics he responded by saying he was satisfied to continue with his studies in the United States. However, sources in Israel's Labour Party consider it very likely that Mr. Barak will be offered a key governmental post in the summer.

Sinai visit more than economics

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

NUWEIBA, Egypt — Every month thousands of Israelis spend a weekend abroad. They go to a place where waiters speak Hebrew, where the shekel is as acceptable a currency as the dollar, and where the Hebrew daily Yediot Aharonot is sold in newspaper stands.

This home away from home is Nuweiba, the Egyptian coastal resort some 90 kilometres south of Eilat.

Some remember Nuweiba for its next-door neighbor, Neviot, a Jewish settlement dismantled by Israel when Sinai was returned to Egypt in 1982. But for most Israelis, especially those who came of age in the 1970s, Nuweiba conjures up memories of lazy days spent along desolate beaches where no one but Bedouin roamed.

From Bohemian to bourgeois

"When you found two trees close enough together you would tie a blanket between them and that was your hotel for the night," recalls one Israeli.

Today Nuweiba, like much of the Sinai coast, has been transformed into a bustling tourism strip with highways, hotels, a shipping port and a nearby airport. And the Israeli youth who used to frequent the once bare coastline have, like their peers in the West, gone from Bohemian to bourgeois.

"Nowadays I wouldn't stay in a place that doesn't have an en-suite bathroom and shower," admits Effi Solev, a 30-something bookkeeper from Tel Aviv, who recalls dreamlike pre-army days spent on the beaches of Sinai.

On this trip, her first since Sinai was returned to Egypt, she is staying in the five-star Hilton Nuweiba, one of dozens of hotels that has sprung up along the Red Sea coast of Egypt.

The Hilton is popular among Israelis, in part, because it is included in various package deals offered to Visa credit card holders. Most of the specials include three nights at this sprawling hotel, bed and breakfast, lavish buffet dinners, one day of sightseeing in an air-conditioned bus with a tour guide, and a ride from the Taba border crossing to the hotel and back. All of which makes this a holiday for those seeking comfort and convenience rather than a rugged encounter with nature.

It is, to be sure, an uneventful vacation. But in this cosy atmosphere, it is easy to overlook the quiet evolution that has taken place in Nuweiba — an Arab city whose residents make every effort to welcome Israelis.

The first time I notice this is in a restaurant, when an Israeli woman, speaking English with a thick Hebrew accent asks for an omelette. Without batting an eye, the Egyptian waiter asks her — in fluent Hebrew — whether she'd like it with tomatoes or cheese.

Another Israeli woman goes into a newsstand in the hope of finding an English-language publication to read. She emerges with the Hebrew Yediot Aharonot and a big smile. "They even take Israeli currency."

During dinner at the hotel, an Egyptian entertainer sings a Hebrew song and is rewarded by a burst of applause from the audience. Later, the evening's entertainment features a magician whose name is not Ahmed or Ali, but Eitan. He is obviously an Israeli — something which prompts the giddy Tel Avivian sitting next to me to begin chanting: "Eitan, Eitan, he's one of ours," until her friends hush her.

During a visit to the town of Nuweiba — where close to 5,000 Egyptians now live — a small group of Israelis enter a clothing shop. The owner, anxious to show off his linguistic skills, speaks to them in Hebrew and tells them about his visit to Israel. Within minutes they are engaged in a fierce argument. Not about politics, but about a subject that seems to evoke even greater passion: which restaurant in Israel serves the best hummus?

For Israelis, used to hiding their passport, language and nationality in many places, these gestures mean a lot. "It's nice to be in an Arab country and feel no different than any other tourist," says Ittai Eren of Tel Aviv.

It makes good business sense for Egyptians to cater to Israelis who make up a large part of the tourism market in Sinai. But this contact has an impact that goes beyond economics.

Israelis feel accepted and welcome

"Before I began working here, I imagined all Israelis as soldiers," one Egyptian employee tells me. "But now I see that they are not that different from us," he says, smiling at a pot-bellied man in swim trunks who is playing with his children near the pool.

Israelis have no illusions about feeling at home in Cairo or in other parts of Egypt that have been gripped by growing Islamic fundamentalism. They can visit there, just like they can visit Jordan — but they don't feel completely at ease in either place. In Sinai, however, they feel accepted and welcome. In this peninsula where Arabs and Jews fought three wars, Israelis now find an oasis of ordinariness that is as refreshing as water in a desert.

The Law of Babysitting

PART 3 OF 6 (continued from Feb. 23 issue)

Insurance liability. If you leave an older child alone with younger children to babysit, then you'd best have a good homeowners' insurance policy. In the event that a child negligently starts a fire, flood or other accident that leads to property damage to your home or to neighbouring dwellings, then the normal homeowners' insurance policy will cover such damage up to the maximum of your policy limits. The only way the insurance company could attempt to escape from having to pay for damages and escape liability is if it could prove that the child had deliberately caused the problem; i.e. by intentionally setting a fire or causing a flood.

It is my information that in such a case, it would be very difficult for the insurance company to prove that a child intentionally caused such a fire or flood. Intent is apparently very difficult to prove, especially when children are involved.

However, although any property damage to one's home and contents or to one's neighbouring premises would be covered in such circumstances, the picture changes dramatically when people are injured or die. The definition of an "insured person" in most homeowner policies apparently includes members of the policyholder's family. For this reason, if the policyholder's child accidentally and negligently injures another child during a fishing expedition, then the policyholder's insurance company would have to pay for the injured child's damages. However, since the definition of an "insured person" includes the members of the policyholder's family, then in the event that a child even accidentally or negligently causes an accident which leads to personal injury to himself or to any other members of his family, then the company's policy does NOT cover liability to that child or any other members of the family within the home. It does, however, cover liability to third parties who may be in the home or in neighbouring dwellings that are injured as a result of the child's negligent conduct, even if the parents had left an older child alone in charge of the household.

There is no policy of which I have become aware in which a particular age is noted under which a child cannot be left alone. However, common sense dictates that the child be mature and sufficiently experienced to deal with problems as they arise and to respond to emergencies by telephoning the appropriate authorities.

In short, a parent who leaves younger children with an older child takes a serious risk that insurance will not cover any injury to any member(s) of the parents' family in the home in the event of an accident, although injuries to non-family members or to property will be covered in most cases.

MARCH 23 ISSUE: The age of "maturity" defined.

Syrian terms unacceptable

"As a result of this survey, we, the Palestinians and the Syrians need to take decisions shortly to end the stalemate," Immigration Minister Yair Tzaban said.

However, ministers said progress on peace would not ensure an end to terror.

"We know terror is a continuing worldwide phenomenon, certainly a Middle Eastern phenomenon," Environment Minister Yossi Sarid declared. "I don't know a single person who deludes himself into thinking that terror will stop."

Saguy devoted some of the briefing to Iran, which he said is still trying to build up its nuclear potential. He said Tehran may be able to acquire a nuclear weapon within three years, if it can buy components abroad.

As for the Palestinians, Saguy and other intelligence officials told cabinet that PLO leader Yasser Arafat has been doing more to curb terrorism than in the past, but it is not enough.

The officials said Islamic fundamentalist terror is still a threat to Israelis.

Despite obstacles in negotiations for extending Palestinian self-rule to the West Bank, the officials said Arafat has no alternative but to continue with the peace process.

The issue of terror came to the fore again Saturday night, when Israeli and Palestinian security officials came under fire near the Jewish settlement of Netzarim in the Gaza Strip.

According to Israeli officials, the Israeli and Palestinian security teams were fired on by unknown assailants from a nearby orchard.

Israeli and Palestinian forces returned fire. Usama al-Borno, 41, a Palestinian school principal who was driving his car near the junction guarded by the two groups, was caught in the crossfire and killed.

Hundreds of Palestinians attended Borno's funeral Sunday amid threats from the Islamic Jihad that Israel would pay for his death.

It was not clear whose bullets killed Borno, and Israeli officials promised an investigation.

Meanwhile, Israel Television reported that Arafat had requested a meeting with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres this week to help set up a summit with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in order to discuss the state of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

The request comes in the wake of a warning by Peres that Israel could suspend talks if Arafat does not crack down on terror.

"If he is too weak to do that, or lacks the will, why should we negotiate with him at all?" Peres said in an interview with the German weekly Der Spiegel.

Also, Rabin has decided to further ease the closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The closure was imposed after the Jan. 22 double suicide bombing near Netanya.

He authorized 3,000 more permits to be issued to married agricultural and industrial workers, ages 30 and older. That brings to 18,000 the number of permits issued, compared to 30,000 before the bombing, in which 21 Israelis were killed.

Zhirinovsky meets with Saddam

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — In a visit to Iraq earlier this month, Russian ultranationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky met with President Saddam Hussein to discuss the creation of a coalition between Orthodox Christians and Muslims that would combat the West.

"For three hours we discussed world and local problems very deeply" in addition to "relations between the Orthodox Russian community and the Muslim community," Zhirinovsky told the media.

Also during his trip, he signed an agreement of cooperation between his Liberal Democratic Party and Iraq's ruling Ba'ath Party.

He was accompanied on his three-day trip by a 50-member delegation, including 20 Russian parliamentary deputies.

Congress brief annoys commission

'The process is backward'

[Cont'd. from page 1]

"I don't feel we got a warm welcome," he said. "They wanted to give us some tough questions, and we gave them some good answers."

The challenges began as soon as the coalition finished its presentation.

A clearly-annoyed Masse defended the hearings as being open to "all points of view," and said they were not a forum for "propaganda."

He also wanted to know how the view of 400,000 Quebecers could be so "homogeneous."

"I wish you had been here for the last three weeks to see how difficult it is to speak for 400,000 people," Masse said.

Bernard responded that the coalition has the mandate to speak for its communities, "the vast majority of whom are federalists.

"We don't for a moment doubt the integrity of the commission or the commissioners," he continued, "but the process is backward" in declaring Quebec sovereign in its draft bill without giving Quebecers a chance to be informed about all the possible repercussions — both pro and con — of sovereignty.

Laurin defended the process, suggesting that the Parti Quebecois' plans to work towards sovereignty were known when Quebecers democratically voted the party in.

Yes, replied Bernard, but while a political party can be partisan, "a government can't."

When Masse said the coalition was willing to live with the consitutional status quo, Bernard held up the Bloc Quebecois' presence in the House of Commons as proof that the political system can evolve.

One commissioner asked if the coalition thinks Quebec nationlalism is xenophobic and intolerant.

Bernard quoted Bloc leader Lucien Bouchard's own definition of nationalism in reply: building a society that is "open, democratic and committed to tolerance and pluralism."

Prior to the coalition's presenting its brief, another group purporting to represent 30 Quebecers "of diverse origins," including Ghila Benesty Sroka, the editor of the Tribune Juive, spoke out in favor of the sovereigntist option.

Sroka was also slated to appear March 3 before the commission with Jewish businesman Paul Nathan as part of a group of pro-sovreigntist Jewish community members Sroka said she is forming.

Sroka told The CJN that the group, called the Rassemblement des juifs pour l'independence, plans to form a committee and organize a conference next month to demonstrate that "all Jews are not federalists.

"The establishment can not speak for all of us," she said.

Virtual reality comes to life for entrepreneurs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — These days you can fight aliens without a shred of courage, just by putting on a hi-tech headset and becoming immersed in an interactive video game.

You don't just manipulate images on a screen, you feel like you're in the game, in this case Zone Hunter. You become an urban warrior, battling aliens in a fight to the finish to save the earth in a deadly race against time.

Sounds exciting? This is the world of virtual reality, the latest technological development in interactive video entertainment. And it is the hottest trend in entertainment, say three young Toronto entrepreneurs who have staked their careers and their money on the growth of the virtual entertainment market.

David Berger, 29, Joe Kriger, 42, and Philip Share, 29, are the co-owners of Holo-Deck Adventures Inc., a company which distributes commercial entertainment units in Canada and operates a chain of entertainment centres in Canadian and American theme parks. The co-owners told The CJN that when all their virtual units are fully installed this spring, Holo-Deck will be largest operator of virtual entertainment centres in North America.

By the end of April the company will be nine times the size it was a year ago. Founded in January of 1994, Holo-Deck took delivery of its first machine last March.

The principals approached Paramount Canada's Wonderland about setting up the machine on the premises and succeeded in getting a revenue-splitting arrangement whereby Holo-Deck supplied and maintained the equipment and the park provided the space and staff operators.

The equipment was an instant hit. "There were line-ups for the machine from day one," Berger said. At the end of 1994 Paramount signed a contract to build a 750-sq.ft. joint venture virtual reality centre to accommodate four machines for the 1995 season. At that time Holo-Deck also signed contracts with three U.S. theme parks.

The five machines allocated for the U.S. will raise the number of machines owned and operated by Holo-Deck to nine, a $500,000 capital investment, Kriger said.

The cost of a single machine and software package is $75,000. Theme parks don't have the money in their budget to purchase the equipment so many operators are opting for revenue sharing plans, Berger said.

Holo-Deck's latest coup is a joint venture with the Ontario Science Centre. The company will be setting up three machines there during March break to give visitors exposure to this technology.

Berger sees this exhibit, which will run from March 13 to 26, as an opportunity to promote the new technology. While virtual entertainment units have been in Canada since 1988, the more technologically advanced Virtuality 2000 series, which operates on CD Rom and a 486 computer, was not available until last winter.

Berger said he began following the development of virtual technology in 1989 after reading an article about a flight simulator made by W Industries, the British-based company which manufactures the Virtuality 2000 series.

He had no trouble convincing Kriger, his partner in an electrical and plumbing business, to branch out into the virtual entertainment business. Kriger said the product appealed to his consumer needs. "I asked myself if that was something I would try. If you like it, you figure there's got to be something there. That's a first step."

Berger also asked longtime friend and former business partner Philip Share to join the venture. The two men co-owned a tanning salon when they were named two of 100 top young Canadian entrepreneurs by the Financial Post and the Royal Bank in 1985. Last fall Share left his job as a database analyst at Sun Life to work at Holo-Deck. "It was scary when I left my full-time job," he said.

At the end of 1993, the principals of Holo-Deck moved on incorporating the company and coughing up the cash to purchase their first entertainment package. "We decided it was time to take the plunge," Berger said.

"We said 'Either it works or we'll have the most expensive Nintendo game on the block,' " Kriger said.

This fall they intend to open a virtual entertainment centre in Toronto, the first of its kind in North America. Holo-Deck will begin developing its own software, and by next spring plans to have 16 theme-park virtual entertainment centres.

Reading papers said key to getting ahead

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Reading the newspaper every day is an essential step in getting ahead, York University students were told at a career development seminar sponsored by Jewish Student Federation.

"Being knowledgeable is the way to go, and reading the newspaper gets you there," said Ira Gluskin, president and CEO of the investment firm Gluskin, Sheff and Associates.

"It is amazing how many successful business people do not have a strong formal education. Studying for a profession does not guarantee anything. It is good training but has little tangible benefit. You have to have drive and you have to have knowledge," he said.

Gluskin, who developed an international reputation as one of Canada's leading securities analysts while working with mutual funds, co-founded Gluskin Sheff in 1984 with Gerald Sheff. The firm now manages in excess of $1 billion in investments. He is also active in community and cultural organizations, writes a newspaper column, and helped bring the recent Barnes Exhibit to the Art Gallery of Ontario.

He told the students that most people have some money "but fritter it away because they never learn what to do with it. They do not realize they can learn a lot about managing money by reading the newspaper. You can read about the Superbowl and about current events, but take it a step further and get a sense of what is going on in the business world."

Gluskin said his firm looks for someone willing to work 24 hours a day, with basic computer skills and the ability to retrieve information quickly and efficiently. "We are not necessarily looking for people with heavy quality education but rather people who are bright, have drive and demonstrate they read the newspaper and really know what is going on.

"A strong investment person knows what is in the newspaper.

BUSINESS BRIEFS

Israel's Stock Index Declining

JERUSALEM — With world money markets reeling in the wake of the collapse of Britain's Barings investment bank, the problems on Israel's stock exchange seem like small potatoes.

But for the government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, troubled by waning support for its peace policy, the steep and ongoing decline in Israeli share prices is a major headache. In early March, Israel's leading stock-price index stood at 146 points, about the same level it was at three years ago. The same index topped 230 points just 10 months ago.

The drop has not only affected share prices, it has also spilled over into the country's provident funds and savings funds, eroding the savings of hundreds of thousands of ordinary people who do not play the market and believed that their nest eggs were safe.

The provident funds, known in Israel as Kupat Gemel, represent the investments of Israeli workers, with matching investments often provided by their employers, in bonds and other financial instruments.

Unlike Americans investing in pension funds, Israelis are able to withdraw from provident funds before retirement age.

After a lengthy Cabinet meeting last week, the government issued a strong statement of support for its own bonds, which form the bulk of the assets of the major provident funds. The Cabinet statement, coupled with intervention by the Bank of Israel, arrested the downward drift of bond prices. Nonetheless, thousands of small investors are believed to have sold their holdings in these funds, with many more planning similar moves in the days ahead.

Market analysts predict that if this market continues, bond prices will continue to tumble.

Arabs Step Up Boycott

WASHINGTON — Despite promises to stop adhering to the Arab boycott of Israel, Saudi Arabia and other Arab nations have stepped up some of their boycott activities, according to the U.S. Commerce Department.

At the end of September, the Gulf Cooperation Council, including Saudi Arabia, vowed to stop complying with the secondary and tertiary boycotts of Israel. The secondary boycott blacklists companies that do business in Israel. The tertiary boycott bars companies from doing business with other companies that do business in Israel.

From October to December, however, Saudi companies filed a total of 399 boycott-related requests from U.S. companies, compared to 365 the previous three months, according to figures released recently by the Commerce Department.

The five other Gulf council countries are Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Oman and Qatar.

Although overall activity among the Gulf countries declined in the most recent period, the number of boycott-related requests that mostly blatantly violate anti-boycott legislation increased. These requests, known as prohibited requests, actually ask companies to take actions that would violate the anti-boycott regulation, such as demanding that a company not use a blacklisted firm.

Israel Attending Cairo Trade Fair

JERUSALEM — For the first time in nine years, Israel will participate in an international trade fair in Cairo later this month.

About 40 Israeli firms are scheduled to attend. In 1986, the last time Israel attended, the fair was marred by tragedy. Terrorists attacked a car of Israeli diplomats, and an Israeli Embassy staffer was killed.

Israel planned to send a delegation to the fair last year, but cancelled after the Hebron massacre. Some 40 countries are expected to take part in the gathering.

Fisher Fremont Travel Ltd.

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Over the past 32 years Sara Pachter has made travel arrangements for thousands of tourists bound for Israel.

"I have taken four generations to Israel in my career," she said.

A group tour specialist for Fisher Fremont Travel Ltd., Pachter recently escorted her 121st group to Israel.

The energetic travel consultant attributes her success to her enthusiasm about Israel — her favorite destination. "You have to be enthusiastic or you're not successful."

Pachter and Fisher Fremont Travel are highly regarded by those in the industry, particularly Israel tour operators and hotels. "They all want our business," she says. "This is a reputation that is enviable."

Many of her clients come to her at the recommendation of friends or relatives who have been on one of her tours.

One of the advantages of travelling with a group is cost, but Pachter stressed that the cheapest tour is not always the best one.

"Price is not necessarily the reason people should choose one agency over another. How they're running tours is most important," she said.

People who select an agency on the basis of cost alone risk disappointment with their accommodation or other aspects of the tour when they arrive in Israel, she said.

She advised consumers to pick an agency for its reputation, its past performance and the quality of its services.

Fisher Fremont Travel is a general agency that sends its clients, whether on business or on holiday, to destinations around the world.

Safari tours

"We have someone in our office who specializes in every area," said Pachter. The safari tours to Kenya are especially popular.

For Pachter, working as a travel consultant is more than a job. She shares this attitude with other consultants at the agency. "It's a love of doing what I'm doing," she said. "Everyone in the office is the same way."

Pachter became a travel consultant in 1962, after years of volunteer work with Holy Blossom Temple, Mount Sinai Hospital and community organizations, including B'nai Brith Women.

"I went into the travel business because I was good at it and was good at dealing with the public,' she says, "and because I worked in the community and people knew my name."

Currently, she is a member of the board of State of Israel Bonds, Women's Division.

She regularly talks to community groups about Israel and the Far East.

Married with four children and three grandchildren, Pachter said travelling to Israel is way of life for her family. Her husband Harry and her children have been tour leaders. Her 21-year-old granddaughter, Jennifer Ross, will soon leave Canada to study at Tel Aviv University for six months.

"She has been to Israel many times," Pachter said, "and I knew it would rub off on her so she would take some education in Israel."

New Chatelaine editor broadens reach of magazine

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — As the new editor of Chatelaine magazine, Rona Maynard presides over what she calls "Canada's biggest kitchen table."

Chatelaine has one of the highest circulations of any periodical in Canada and has been read by women from coast to coast for 66 years.

"We're read by one in four English-speaking women in Canada," says Maynard. "That's quite a platform. No other women's magazine has quite the penetration that we have."

As Maynard sees it, Chatelaine is a vast forum in which women across Canada may share their stories, both personal and professional, and in which important issues receive timely treatment, often before they reach the front pages of daily newspapers. Like a kitchen table, it is the place for lively, spirited discussion about everything from sex to assisted suicide to the school system, she says.

"We're the only women's magazine around that can say to its readers, 'You are reading us today on the subject of child support taxes, just as your mother read us in the 1950s on the subject of family violence, and just as your grandmother read us in the 1920s on the subject of the treatment of household servants.' That was quite a hotly debated issue in those days."

Chatelaine's new editor is the daughter of the late writer and broadcaster Fredelle Maynard, who wrote Raisins and Almonds, a memoir about growing up Jewish on the Prairies. Her father was Max Maynard, a landscape artist from British Columbia. Raised in New Hampshire, she won numerous fiction-writing competitions as a child and had her first byline in Ladies' Home Journal for a short story when she was only 15.

Maynard came to Toronto in 1969 to study English at the University of Toronto and married a Torontonian in 1970. Since then, she has had an illustrious career as a freelance writer for Maclean's, Report on Business, Canadian Business, Chatelaine and other publications. She has also been a departmental editor at Maclean's.

Typically, Chatelaine's February issue ventures into discussions of timely new issues and profiles, even as it embraces traditional topics for women. As well, monthly departments provide recipes and product information.

"People sometimes ask, 'Why do you still have recipes and beauty and fashion tips?' We believe that for a lot of woman, these are an important means of self-expression ... I'm often asked whether I am a feminist, and my answer is that I'm committed to equality for women, from the boardroom to the bedroom. But we believe very strongly that our readers live in a world that includes men and children. They want well-rounded lives and we're here to help them get what they want.

"We want to set the agenda," she says. "We're entering times of tremendous social change. We want to be right on the front lines of those changes, and to tell each reader what's ahead and what she should do about it."

Maynard also want to "broaden the reach" of Chatelaine with more cutting-edge medical stories, more political profiles, more personal stories of women's lives from across Canada.

Women Of The Word: Jewish Women & Jewish Writing Edited by Judith R. Baskin, Wayne State University Press $18.95 (US) paperbound

Modern secular culture offered Jewish women in Europe, Israel and Latin America unprecedented and exciting opportunities for self expression, which they began to explore at the end of the last century in poetry and prose, in Hebrew, Yiddish and other tongues.

The essays in this companion volume to the editor's well-received previous work, Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, differ widely in both subject matter and style.

All are scholarly and readable, and enlarge the reader's awareness of the diversity, richness, boldness and importance of women to Jewish writing in the past and today.

Judith Dishon makes clear in her essay on images of women in medieval Hebrew literature that while some of the texts praise women for their loving concern, fidelity, piety and self-sacrifice, most depict women as vengeful, seductive, treacherous and cunning.

These unpleasant portrayals — all the work of men — were sometimes intended as satire or humor, and often borrowed from biblical and rabbinic literature. Dishon writes that it is regrettable these stories and sayings created an overwhelmingly negative stereotype of women in medieval Hebrew writing that reinforced earlier, similar traditions, and remained a feature of subsequent Jewish literature.

Shmuel Niger's 1919 essay Yiddish Literature and the Female Reader concludes with a depiction of Gluckel of Hamein, one of the extraordinary Jewish women of the Renaissance.

Gluckel herself chronicled her many-sided life from her birth in 1645 until five years before her death in 1724 at 89. Thanks to the matches "she arranged for her 12 children, she came to know and be connected with the Jewish elite of various cities and countries across Europe," Niger writes.

"Her memoirs describe these people, as well as the turmoil, upheavals, and movements of her time, providing a wonderful historical source on Jewish life at the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th century in Germany, France, Denmark, Holland, Austria and Poland."

Anzia Yezierska was one of the first American Jewish immigrants who chose to write English prose rather than Yiddish poetry. Laura Wexler depicts this gifted author as torn between her Old World loyalties and the demands of an alien culture. What was demanded from her was "historical amnesia," a conscious forsaking of the past.

In a groundbreaking essay, Sara Horowitz shows how the experiences of women Holocaust survivors have been marginalized. She relates the searing experience of a pregnant woman in the Buchenwald concentration camp, who was lined up with 6,000 fellow inmates and told "whoever is pregnant is going to be hanged ... Here's a camp, and you should work." After that, she lived in fear.

This story is typical of the special tribulation suffered by women during the Holocaust. Their particular orientation toward family relationships, and their singular outlook were often forgotten or trivialized.

Other essays deal with women writers in Italy, Israel and Latin America and the special contribution of Jewish women to Yiddish poetry.

This volume, edited by the chair of the Department of Judaic Studies at the State University of New York at Albany, is a global contribution to the field of Jewish scholarship.

Documentary tells story of child Holocaust survivors

Of the thousands of young Jewish children living in the western Polish city of Bendzin before World War II, barely a dozen survived the Holocaust. Film-maker Mira Reym Binford was one of those children.

Through interviews, rare archival film and photos and oral testimony from survivors, Diamonds in the Snow, a new one-hour TV documentary, airing on PBS March 9 at 1:30 p.m., interweaves the story of three little girls who survived through the courage and determination of their families and their Jewish, Polish and German rescuers.

Binford is an associate professor of mass communications at Quinnipiac College in Hamden, Conn.

Diamonds in the Snow takes its title from an incident in Binford's mother's life. While marching through the snow at Auschwitz, she found a diamond, which she later traded for a piece of bread. That diamond was much like the Jewish children who survived and like the non-Jewish families who risked their lives to save others — rare and precious.

Unlike Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List, which concentrates on the role of the rescuer, Diamonds in the Snow focuses on the survivors and their childhood at a time of world upheaval. Binford and fellow child survivors Ada Raviv and Shulamit Levin recall their feelings as their parents disappeared, their world crumbled around them and they became dependent on strangers, who, at one and the same time, could be compassionate and cruel.

Each of the women tells of her experiences through fragmented memories that reveal common features as well as great differences. Feelings of abandonment, the penetrating smell of fear and the sound of Nazi soldiers taking over their city are prominent memories.

Diamonds in the Snow depicts not only the horrors of the Holocaust seen through a child's perspective, but also the complexity of human nature. It also challenges perceptions about the actions of Jews, Poles and Germans during that period. The film is a deeply moving, historically authentic portrayal of the remarkable individuals whose courage helped the three girls survive.

The complex figure of Alfred Rossner, like the more famous Oskar Schindler, saved Jewish lives while employing forced Jewish labor in his textile factories. Unlike Schindler, Rossner ultimately paid for his actions with his life.

Among its many awards, Diamonds in the Snow won first prize in the National Jewish Video Competition and received a CINE Golden Eagle Award, both in 1994. Diamonds in the Snow was produced, written and directed by Binford. Hank Heifetz was the co-writer.

Playwright provokes debate with look at Hebron mosque massacre

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To write a one-act play of last year's Hebron mosque massacre and keep it even-handed is no mean task, but local playwright Jason Sherman has managed it in Reading Hebron.

The play, based on the Feb. 25 killing of 39 Palestinians by Baruch Goldstein, ran Feb. 1 to 5 at the Theatre Centre East as part of the Under the Umbrella festival.

Reading Hebron starred Liza Balkan, Michael Healey and Earl Pastko.

Incredibly, Sherman manages to inject humor into his astute commentary on the Israeli scene through the appearance of the late Israeli writer Yeshayahu Leibowitz, an inveterate critic of government policy. Leibowitz trots off with Palestinian spokesperson Edward Said to see the CN Tower while on a visit to Toronto.

Sherman's alter ego is Nathan Abramowitz, a Canadian student trying to find out what really happened at Hebron. Abramowitz's motives are suspected by both the Israeli consulate and Palestine House. Only at the Metro Reference Library does he find an empathetic woman staffer, more interested in him personally than in his subject.

Some may dispute the implicit criticism of Israeli policy toward Palestinians, or argue that it is not legitimate dramatic material, but a playwright's well-meaning intent to invoke debate on these momentous times is creditable.

Living Islam episode documents Muslim view of Mideast conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The orthodox Muslim view of the Arab-Israeli dispute and terrorism is the single most compelling topic surveyed in the final segment of Vision TV's six-part series, Living Islam.

Entitled The Last Crusade, it will be broadcast March 14 at 8:30 p.m. It is hosted by Pakistani Islamic scholar Akbar Ahmed.

To most Muslims, Israel is "occupied Palestine," he intones. Indeed, some Muslims equate Israel's existence with the medieval Crusaders.

Ahmed might have tried to gauge the effect of the current Mideast peace process on the minds of the Muslim faithful.

Have they changed their attitude to Israel since the historic rapprochement between Israel and the PLO? We don't know, since Ahmed does not address this relevant question.

Islam, we're told, provides "certainty and hope" to Palestinians living amid repression and poverty. As the camera pans on a group of youths, Ahmed pointedly asks "is it surprising that most of these boys will join so-called terrorist groups like Islamic Jihad and Hamas?"

Muslims in Jerusalem and Hebron, he claims, feel besieged and fear they will be evicted from their homes by Israel.

They don't object to Judaism, but to militant Zionism, proclaims Ahmed somewhat condescendingly.

Devout Muslims, he adds, are ready to "sacrifice" their lives for Islam. In this connection, it is suggested that Islam is on the ascendancy, having replaced Arab nationalism as a rallying point. A few years ago, "Palestinian freedom fighters" fought for land. Now, we're informed, they sacrifice themselves on behalf of Islam.

Ahmed's grasp of Israeli society is shaky. Utterly insensitive to the fact that terrorism is almost a daily reality in Israel, he implicity rebukes Israeli soldiers who pray at the Western Wall with their firearms. Presumbly, they should deposit their guns and rifles somewhere else, leaving themselves vulnerable to attack.

Ahmed is also offended that scantily-clad Jewish bathers have the effontery to sunbathe on a beach near an abandoned mosque in Jaffa. What does he expect?

The Last Crusade also looks at Muslim communities in Nigeria and Bosnia.

In passing, Ahmed reminds a viewer that jihad is the duty of all practicing Muslims. By jihad, he means cleansing one's soul or making war. Does Ahmed not realize this flexible concept may be harmful? For it leaves fanatical believers with just enough leeway to act out their wildest impulses and beliefs.

Ed Feldman and Joe L'Erario

If you've ever seen Ed Feldman and Joe L'Erario do their thing on the weekly show Furniture to Go on The Learning Channel (TLC), you'll know why I couldn't help but laugh when I ran into them recently at the Canadian Workshop Show in Toronto.

Skilled craftsmen, Feldman and L'Erario are becoming familiar to television viewers across North America and parts of Europe as Ed and Joe, the wisecracking workshoppers who provoke chuckles as they convey useful how-to secrets of furniture repair, refinishing, restoration and upholstery.

Since they deliver much valuable instruction along with their comic schtick, they reject any description of themselves as the Abbott and Costello of televised furniture repair. "Some guys say, 'The workshop is a sacred place, it's supposed to be serious,' and they don't like us because of it," said Feldman. "We set out to have a little fun in the workshop, but we do take our crafts seriously, and we always pay attention to the safety rules."

Years ago, Feldman was working his way through college as a construction worker when he met Joe on a construction site. "Whatever we were doing, pouring concrete or tying steel, we made the rest of the construction crew laugh," he recalled. In the mid-80s, L'Erario started an antique restoration business and Feldman became a professional upholsterer by day who taught courses in furniture repair by night.

Where did the idea for the show originate? "I got confident with my teaching and people were always laughing — that's when it hit me," Feldman said. "All the other how-to shows were boring. Joe and I were friends, we had a good rapport ... He knew more about refinishing, and I knew about upholstery."

"So we wrote a pilot script," L'Erario jumped in, "sent it to PBS, and they liked it."

The Philadelphia duo nailed down their contract with TLC in 1992 and have been sanding, screwing, stripping and shellacking their way to success since. Besides the humor, there are other reasons the show is popular, its hosts contend. By focusing on everyday pieces of furniture instead of a whole house, they appeal to the majority of people who live on limited means. Each week, they demonstrate how to turn damaged, worn-out furniture into attractive, functional items — how to fix the legs of an armchair, for example, without spending an arm and a leg.

"These are jobs that most people are thinking about and want to do," said Feldman. "They aren't intimidating and they don't go over budget. They usually cost less than $100."

While Feldman's humor is tinged by his Jewishness, L'Erario occasionally alludes to his Italian ancestry through comic references. Theirs seems to be a model friendship that stands up as strongly as a sturdy table or chair. If you're at all interested in the time-honored craft of furniture repair, check out Furniture To Go and be prepared to be educated and entertained.

In Brief: An exhibition of paintings by Gary Silverberg, entitled Reactionism '95: It's A Business World After All, is on display at Gallery One, 121 Scollard St. in Toronto, until March 29. The paintings "are framed by the icons of communication, money, and power," Silverberg explains.

Profession: Neonazi, a controversial documentary about neo-Nazism, premieres on TVO's Human Edge March 29 at 10 p.m. Made by Munich filmmaker Winfried Bonengel, the documentary opens at the headquarters of Toronto's most notorious Holocaust denier, Ernst Zundel.

Get Thee Out is a 1991 Russian film that explores what happens in a small Russian town at the turn of the century when anti-Semitism rears its ugly head. The Toronto Jewish Film Society is screening it March 19 at 7 p.m. in the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall. The film Hidden Children (Canada, 1994) is scheduled on April 9.

Derailed, a play by Emil Sher, runs at Factory Theatre Studio Cafe in Toronto until March 19.

Bishop Museum a treasury of Hawaii

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

HAWAII — Tucked neatly away in the verdant foothills, embraced by the volcanic spires that surround this island paradise, is one of the lesser-known jewels of Hawaii.

A 20-minute drive from Honolulu brings one to the the Bishop Museum. This treasury of Hawaiian heritage comprises five separate buildings spread over several acres saturated with the aroma of hundreds of native species of flowers and shrubs.

The museum was founded in 1889 by Charles Reed Bishop, a prominent Honolulu businessman, as a lasting memorial to his wife, Princess Bernice Pauahi Bishop, great granddaughter and last surviving direct descendant of King Kamehameha I, unifier of the Hawaiian islands.

The four original edifices, all listed in the American National Register of Historic Places, were constructed between 1889 and 1900 of local lava rock, with interior surfaces of carved, richly veneered, native koa wood (now almost extinct), in Romanesque style. The Museum's cathedral-like central gallery stands as a pre-eminent example of 19th century exhibition design.

The Bishop Museum now constitutes the world's largest depository of ancient Hawaiian and Pacific artifacts, currently numbering about 200,000 items. These primarily encompass Hawaiian historical development prior to Captain James Cook's initial entry into Honolulu Harbor in 1778.

Before its "discovery," Hawai was ruled by a pantheon of gods, mana (supernatural powers), kings and kapus (taboo rituals).

Early Hawaiians had no written language. Later explorers recorded the 12-letter oral alphabet, but anthropological evidence indicates that war was a regular occurrence among the various tribes and seemed to culminate in the cannibalism of defeated captives.

Until June 4, Bishop Museum will be celebrating this amazing navigational feat with major exhibits of traditional arts and crafts, artisans, dancers, workshops and displays, highlighting the glories of Hawaiian culture, past and present — a must-see stop on any tour of this island paradise.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

Israel Events at Passover: An Israel Events brochure from the Israeli Ministry of Tourism lists numerous events due to take place April 16 to 20. They include the Haifa Children's Theatre Festival (phone 04-621555), a celebration of spring in the Land of 1000 Caves at Beit Guvrin (07-874222), Music & Nature Days at Misgav (04- 902352), a Classical Festival at Kibbutz Ein Gev (06-758039), Nature Trips in the Negev (03-377695), and the Chamber Music Festival at Beit Daniel, Zichron Ya'akov (06-399001).

But wait — there's more! Events also include an Art Fair in the Cardo, Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem (02-240641), walking tours with song and dance performances at Neot Kedumim (08-233840), Folk Music and Instrumental Festival at Mevasseret Zion (02-342054), a Shearing Festival for the whole family at Kfar Hanassi (06-932870) and an International Symposium on Sculpture at Ma'alot (04-975646/7).

Details subject to change. For further information, call the ministry's events department in Jerusalem (02-754906) or Tel Aviv (03-660257/8).

Guide to Arizona Available: Last year, some 300,000 Canadians visited Arizona, and the Arizona Office of Tourism hopes to increase that number in 1995. It recently released the 1995 version of its popular Arizona Traveler, a full-color 96-page guide meant to help Canadians discover the natural wonders of the Grand Canyon state. To receive a free copy, call 800-842-8257.

Humanity and the Manatee: For decades, the large docile sea cows known as manatees were victims to outboard motors and deliberate acts of inhumanity. Today the manatee is a protected species in Florida. March is Manatee Month in Tampa, where visitors can watch the annual spring migration of this friendly mammal as it leaves its winter freshwater habitat and moves out into the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

The Manatee Viewing Centre near the Apollo Beach in Tampa is open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. throughout March. Here's where you can see and learn about these gentle creatures. But remember, people are not permitted to touch or feed the manatee.

Passover Getaway: Nestled in an oasis of green lawns, towering palms and fragrant orange trees, the five-star Wigwam Resort in Phoenix, Ariz., makes an exclusive desert resort. Loaded with facilities, it is offering glatt kosher meals, two full seders, children's programs, a full Jewish cultural program, even some classic Yiddish films. Write Madan Travel at The Wigwam Resort, Litchfield Park, Ariz., or at 130 S.W. Third Ave., Dania, Fla.

Switzerland Brochures: Two new guides are available to help travellers get the latest information about this land of mountains and clocks. The 30-page brochure, Look No Further: Switzerland, provides updated information about the Alps, bustling cities, quaint villages, ways to travel and places to stay.

Meanwhile the new Swiss Youth Hostel Guide lists 79 locations. For copies of either or both brochures, write: Swiss National Tourist Office, 926 The East Mall, Etobicoke, Ont. M9B 6K1.

Incidentally, Telecom '95, the world's premier trade fair on telecommunications, is set to take place in Geneva, Oct. 3 to 11.

Switzerland: Land of mountains and clocks.

British Airways Holidays: Hot off the presses, British Airways Holidays' latest brochure offers a wide variety of summer programs, with many exciting accommodation choices and destinations in Britain, France, Italy, Greece and other countries of Europe.

The brochure lists some three dozen London hotels, with rates starting at $55 and climbing to $204 per person per night. It also lists rates for other European hotels: a room at the completely modernized Feine Palace in Florence is $69 a night, $78 at the Herodion in Athens, $105 at the deluxe Sheraton Lisboa in Lisbon. Hertz car rentals within Britain start at $24 a day.

For a copy of the brochure or for more details about specific British Airways Holidays, see your travel agent or call the airline's toll-free number, 1-800-AIRWAYS.

Coldwell Banker Pinnacle named top Canadian office

Coldwell Banker Pinnacle was recently honored as Premier Office at the International Business Conference in Orlando, Florida. The award was earned by being the number one Canadian Company in Commission Income.

"This was quite a surprise!" says Barbara Raber, Manager of the Willowdale office. "Having just started in business in March of last year, we were working on a shorter year than the other Coldwell Banker offices. It is satisfying to know that all the hard work and planning has its rewards."

Barbara attributes the success of her company to the farsightedness of the principal owners who, in a bold move, purchased a number of real estate offices in what was considered a highly volatile real estate market. Barbara goes on to say, "The fact that we have nine offices in Toronto and greater surrounding area certainly gives us advantages. It allows a wide scope for networking, referrals and relocations. We are able to offer our clients real estate services from Guelph to downtown Toronto."

Barbara quickly points out that no matter what else has changed in real estate, it is still the people that make it work. "We are fortunate to have an excellent calibre of sales representatives and they are backed by one of the most powerful real estate names I've seen in years."

Coldwell Banker has had phenomenal growth in Canada since their joint venture with Canada Trust in the fall of 1993. Although they have been a dominant force in the U.S. real estate for years, and named as the top real estate franchise to invest in (1993 and 1994 Success Magazine), they were a sleeping giant in Canada. "All this changed in fall of '93 – it seems we grew overnight," says Barbara. "The last number I saw were 228 offices with 4,200 representatives (in Canada)." Asked what the plans are for '95, Barbara comments: "To offer the best possible results to our clients. Business grows from having satisfied customers who will recommend us to their friends and family. This is the sort of business this is."

Jewish Television For The Next Century

by Dr. Morton Weinfeld

Thanks to Milton Winston, pioneer Jewish TV broadcaster in Montreal, for initial suggestions. A version of this article will be published in Jerusalem Letter, a series of periodic reports of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, edited and published by Daniel J. Elazar.

Most of us are by now feeling swamped with magazine articles dealing with the new telecommunications revolution. We have been told – ad nauseum – to brace ourselves for the 500 channel television universe. Show us another article on the information super highway, and we might long for the off ramp.

But not just yet. As television is about to be transformed by high tech revolutions, the organized Jewish community – locally, regionally, nationally, and internationally – has fallen asleep at the switch. The next century will soon be upon us, with a huge new communications potential for organized Jewry to use in the struggle for survival. And nothing much seems to be happening.

This is ironic, in that in the United States and most every other western country, Jews are well represented in the fields of radio, television, communications, journalism and entertainment. Yet this tremendous Jewish resource has not yet been directed to meeting serious communal needs.

Jewish TV Worldwide Opens Exciting Possibilities

Imagine the following:

Every English speaking Jewish family – in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia, South Africa, and last but certainly not least, Israel – would have access to a full service, high quality all day Jewish TV channel, part of an international Jewish television network. (For convenience we will refer to this channel/network as JTV). A typical channel could feature programming that would be a blend of local, national, and international content. Some programs, such as news reports, fast breaking bulletins, and other special events, might be broadcast live or on tape delay because of time difference, to an international Jewish audience, a true "klal Yisroel."

Such a channel could feature all kinds of programming, a blend of the high brow, middle brow, and low brow with something for everyone. No Judaic ideology or perspective could dominate; some form of pluralistic accommodation would be the rule. Consider:

News and Public Affairs

Why not a daily Jewish news show, of perhaps a half hour to an hour, divided into local, national and international news portions? The local news could be produced locally, while the international stories could be taken where feasible from another mainstream network, from Israeli television (dubbed or subtitled), or even from foreign correspondents of the JTV.

Morton Weinfeld is Professor of Sociology and Director of the Canadian Ethnic Studies Program at McGill University. He is co-editor of The Jews in Canada, edited and published by Daniel J. Elazar.

"PERSONNAGES" BY GHITTA CAISERMAN-ROTH, MONTREAL

Why not a Jewish "Sixty Minutes" with investigative Jewish journalism? Why not Jewish interview shows like "Face the Nation" (a model actually exists) or argumentative panel shows like "The McLaughlin Group" or "Inside Washington" or "Crossfire"? Imagine a weekly panel with people like Norman Podhoretz, Ruth Wisse, Alan Dershowitz, Leonard Fein, or Arthur Waskow (you get the picture, pick your own advocates) debating Jewish affairs of the day. Again, some such public affairs programs could be taken from similar Israeli shows, either dubbed or subtitled.

Jewish-Cultural Special Events

The possibilities are limitless. In any week there are many stimulating lectures or symposia sponsored by synagogues and other Jewish cultural associations, and featuring outstanding Jewish minds. Judaic scholars, authors and artists, politicians, public personalities could be highlighted. Periodic lectures by some of the outstanding Jewish thinkers and speakers of our time would deserve a place; why should these events be limited only to those fortunate to attend the events in whatever city they were held? They can all be taped and re-broadcast.

Jewish cultural productions of various kinds could also be taped and broadcast. An outstanding klezmer concert, a performance by a Yiddish Theatre, a telecast of Israel's Hassidic Song festival. Concerts of cantorial music and Jewish choirs could also be broadcast, notably to coincide with various Jewish holidays. And why not the best of Israeli rock music?

And why not the occasional Jewish sporting event? Jewish sports fans (I include myself) would enjoy Israeli soccer and basketball matches against international opponents. And why not a telecast of the highlights of the Maccabiah games?

Many local events in various communities could also be filmed and broadcast. These could include Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations, March to Jerusalem highlights, etc.

The Best of Jewish Entertainment

There already exists a backlog of taped Jewish Performances, by comedians, singers, etc., whether on variety shows (from Ed Sullivan to the Tonight shows) to more recent sit-coms such as "Rhoda" and "Seinfeld". Jewish humour has been prominent from the work of Borscht Belt legends to current stand-up comics. And why not re-broadcast select shows from these sit-coms which feature a Jewish theme in given episodes?

Jewish Documentaries

There exists a host of programs available, via PBS, independent producers, Israeli television, as well as mainstream networks in the US and from counterparts in Canada and the UK, on Jewish themes. From Abba Eban's celebrated series: "Heritage: Civilization and the Jews" to the pioneering NBC mini series "Holocaust", many first rate productions exist. And more important, JTV would provide an avenue for new documentaries to be produced.

Jewish and Israeli Film Festivals

Why not feature the best of recent films on Jewish themes, including the best of Israeli cinema? There are hundreds of films which have been made which deal in one way or another with Jewish themes, many of high quality. Why not alternate classic Jewish films with more recent ones, from "Hester Street" to "Goodbye Columbus" to "Fiddler on the Roof" to "Schindler's List".

Educational Programming

JTV could devote a good deal of its daytime schedule to Jewish educational programming, useful for Jewish schools of various types. These programs could include the Israeli "Rehov Sumsum" ("Sesame St.") to various programs which have been done, and could be done, to explicate the various Jewish holidays and rituals.

Special Programs

Why not a weekly program on Jewish cooking, featuring not only the usual Jewish recipes but also

VOLUME XXIII, NUMBER 1, 1995

EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK

Our issue begins with a dramatic exposition from Professor Morton Weinfeld of an innovative idea that is almost breathtaking in its scope: the creation of a world-wide Jewish TV network that would serve Jews throughout the world. This has now been made technically possible because of the rapidly expanding "information highway", which can flash new information or ideas to all corners of the globe literally instantaneously. Professor Weinfeld calls on his expertise in sociology to adumbrate for us all implications of this idea – social, political, and financial – and concludes that precisely because Jews are living in so many different parts of the world, Jewish TV has a potential audience, and equally important, potential sponsors for such an idea, far more than is available to any other group whose population is located in only one specific area.

Rabbi Dow Marmur traces for us the reaction of Jews in the Diaspora to the negotiations now being actively pursued by Israeli leaders and Arabs, which now seem irreversible and will sooner or later lead to the realization of the dream of an Israel finally at peace with its neighbours. He points out that the present leaders of Diaspora communities have operated on the assumption that Israel needs their moral and financial support and will always continue to do so. As a result, they have become used to being courted at home, in Israel, and even in Washington. They have been showered with testimonials, plaques and dinners and the fact that what should have been their major contribution to Israel's welfare – stimulating Aliyah – a dismal failure, has been ignored. The present emphasis on negotiations leading to the peace process now leaves Diaspora leaders in "portentous disorder".

Another aspect of the dramatic change in the priorities of Diaspora communities is the fact that whereas for the past fifty years, the principal concern of Diaspora Jews has been the future viability of Israel, this focus has been changed to the future viability of Diaspora communities themselves, threatened as they are by declining populations due to birth control, intermarriage, and secularism. This has presented to Diaspora communities (who, like all Jews today, are declared Zionists) a further dilemma: can they, in good conscience, continue to support the classic Zionist ideological framework which calls on them to increase Aliyah from the Diaspora as their most important priority, while at the same time work to preserve their own Diaspora communities – to use their own buzz-word: to ensure "continuity" at home.

Stuart Schoenfeld sees an additional threat to Diaspora communities in the fact that "globalization" – the concept of "one world" – pushes Jews toward becoming "reluctant cosmopolitans". While all Jews as individuals welcome the end of the Cold War, the burgeoning of the "open society" and the concomitant decrease of anti-Semitism, lays before Jews the dilemma that they no longer have only one "meaningful center of gravity" (Schoenfeld's phrase) the Jewish one: now they may select a different center of gravity in the form of another religion, or else become secularists and therefore have no center of gravity at all. His conclusion is to call for a superior "Jewish option": to improve Jewish education and perhaps even to develop schools that act like communities rather than institutions.

William Bilek has long been a spokesman for Canadian Zionists. In the present euphoria about the remarkable progress of the peace negotiations, he sounds a warning note about the possibility that the Rabin government may be tempted to sacrifice Israeli security and offer too much territorial compromise. He is further troubled by the fact that the Labor Party has contravened its own electoral platform in which they declared that Arafat was "a negative influence on the peace process who should be kept out of it at all costs". They have thereby lost credibility with the Israeli voters and as a result the Labor Government has not consulted them about the many compromises they have already made.

Poetry by Shel Krakofsky and Judy Shier completes our issue.

discussions about kashrut? And another program on Jewish travel, featuring not only travel to Israel, but perhaps a Jewish angle for tourists to various other destinations (e.g. Spain) where fascinating aspects of Jewish life past or present could be discovered. Why not a self-help program dealing with a Jewish perspective on various personal or family crises and relationships? And why not a Jewish "Dating Game" or – lehavdil –Matchmaking Game?

Hebrew Language Programs

JTV might also play a role in the teaching of Hebrew. This could be done directly through some Hebrew language educational programs aimed at children or other learners. It could also come about indirectly through the use of some Israeli news reports or other programs, with subtitles.

Crises or Celebrations

Finally, JTV might enable Jewish homes throughout the planet to be connected in times of crises or decision, be these wars in the Middle East, terrorist bombings in Argentina, or Israeli peace treaties with enemies. One can imagine JTV providing live, in depth coverage of major events, to an extent not available on commercial or mainstream networks. The Lubavitchers have paved the way in building community through live coverage of the late Rebbe's "fabrengen", telecast to cable stations throughout the world. JTV could extend the concept, helping create a strong sense of "klal Yisroel".

Who Would Watch?

It is hard to estimate what the "market" for JTV might be. While most of the viewers of such a channel would be Jewish, experience with the existing Jewish programs available on cable suggests that some non-Jews, for whatever reason, watch these shows. A good portion of that viewing may be simply channel surfing. But the main audience would depend on the total Jewish population, and then on the proportion which would be sufficiently identified, or curious, to watch.

As long as JTV would have to be accessed as part of a cable package, then Jews in areas of scant Jewish population would have a more difficult time. Jews who live in major urban centres, however, would likely be able to convince cable companies to carry JTV as part of their package. However, once other signal carriers apart from cable become more common, from satellite to phone lines – and the day is fast approaching, that limitation will vanish. Viewers in any location would have easier access to the 500 channel universe, and Jews in small or isolated communities could also be reached. With more American Jews moving to exurbs, or to newer cities outside the Northeast which may lack the range of established Jewish institutions, JTV could have an acute role to play at a local or regional level.

In the United States alone, we have an estimated 1.8 million "entirely Jewish" households. If we add the Jewish population of Canada, the UK, Australia, South Africa, and English-speaking Israel, one can speak of a minimum of well over 2.1 million households. How can we estimate the potential audience who might actually watch, whether regularly or the odd time? We might have to infer this size from other indicators.

In the United States, about 33% of Jews read a Jewish newspaper, and 50% belong to a congregation. In Canada the comparable percentages are 60% and 67%; one estimates that the proportions in the UK, Australia, and South Africa would be closer to Canada's. These then give us a ballpark estimate of one million Jewish households of likely viewers, including Israel.

Diaspora Response To The Peace Process

by Dr. Rabbi Dow Marmur

One of the important sources for our understanding of North American Jewry is Jonathan Woocher's book, Sacred Survival – The Civil Religion of American Jews.

America

Much of his description of civil religion suggests that it is based on the myth that Jews everywhere – in the Diaspora as well as in Israel – are beleaguered by a hostile world, waiting to finish what Hitler did not accomplish. The task of civil religion is to prevent it from happening.

I do not mean to say that there hasn't been an historic basis for this myth, but I believe that, by now, it has, mercifully, largely become only a myth, and that to understand it as a myth may help us to understand the present turmoil among many leaders of Diaspora Jewry in the face of the changes that are taking place in and around Israel. Judaism still faces many dangers, but imminent destruction by our enemies is probably not one of them.

Emil Fackenheim's formulation of the commandment to survive, which has had such a profound impact on contemporary Jewish life, has been – I fear, deliberately – misinterpreted by the protagonists of civil religion to imply that this should take the place of most, if not all, of the other commandments. Jews were prepared to break every other mitzvah with a clean conscience as long as they could persuade themselves that they were keeping this one, primarily by offering financial support to Israel.

The possibility that this myth has become more difficult to sustain is, therefore, a cause for concern, even alarm, in some circles. Though we need not go as far as some have done in asserting that the Diaspora needs enemies to justify its existence – I recall articles by Arthur Hertzberg and Egon Mayer – there is little doubt that Jewish leaders in North America have been caught off balance by the prospect of peace in the Middle East. The negotiations with the PLO, the accord with Jordan, diplomatic ties with Morocco and the prospect of an agreement with Syria are creating a scenario for which Diaspora Jewry is not prepared. By all accounts, the Israeli public is much more ready for it.

Of course, it is possible that the peace scenario is unreal, and that we should beware of premature assumptions about a post-Oslo era in Jewish history, as I understand Emil Fackenheim to warn. Yet, it is difficult to ignore the signs, whether we approve of the outcome or not. It is also possible that the government of Israel is squandering the security of the state, but here, too, it is difficult to dismiss Yitzhak Rabin, the military strategist and political tactician, as being irresponsible.

Diaspora Leaders Caught Off Balance

Yet, many leaders of Diaspora Jewry are doing precisely that – dismissing Rabin, or, more conveniently, blaming it on the evil influence of Peres. Hence the visible discomfort of many of our communal luminaries with the altered state of Israel-Diaspora relations: Though inhibited, so far at least, to call Rabin a traitor, they are nevertheless distressed by the prospect of the destruction of the myth on which their leadership was founded.

To complicate matters for those who hanker for the status quo ante, anti-Semitism in most countries is decreasing steadily. If there is a danger to Jewish life today, it probably comes more from within – from the lack of commitment to Judaism and the dissensions within our own ranks – than from our enemies, be they Arabs in the Middle East or Jew-haters on our doorstep. That is, as I understand it, the view of Geoffrey Paul, the former editor of The Jewish Chronicle of London and now its American correspondent. In a recent piece in that paper he wrote:

> None seems to have been more surprised by the swift pace of events in the Middle East than the coalition of Jewish leadership represented in the Presidents' Conference, which having been taught by generations of Israeli governments to parrot its slogans about Arafat, the PLO and the Golan Heights, has found itself back-pedalling on deflated tyres.
> The cosy intimacies of their extended relationship with former Likud Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir – who, having few secrets to share with them, was able to make them privy to almost everything he was thinking – has been replaced by the bold peacemaking initiatives of Messrs. Rabin and Peres, who talk to them often and tell them nothing.

As a result, American Jewish leaders are ideologically confused and personally peeved. Though polls indicate that the majority of those whom they lead support Rabin's peace initiative, the people in the forefront of the community do not always reflect it. Even if they are not on the right of the political spectrum, they nevertheless often display remarkable and inexplicable lack of enthusiasm for current Israeli government policies, for they don't feel to have had any part of them: Neither Rabin nor Clinton seems to need them, and neither bothers to consult them much.

Hirsh Goodman, the editor of The Jerusalem Report, had some fun at the expense of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations' coming out in favour of the peace process when he wrote that "had it (the organization) not (come out in favour of the peace process), it may have had to fight the next war without Israel." At the same time he also mocked the request from Rabin's office to American rabbis to promote peace and pray for it, whereof more later. Goodman failed, however, to explain these moves in relation to the disarray in the Diaspora.

Canadian Jewish Leaders More Hawkish Than Americans

The situation in Canada is the same as in America, only more so. For not only do our leaders take their cues from the United States – despite their protestations to the contrary – but they have, on the whole, also been more intuitively hawkish than their American counterparts, partly because of the strong presence of Holocaust survivors in the two major centres of Canadian-Jewish life, and partly because Jews in Canada are one generation "behind" American Jewry in the process of acculturation. We seem to have a little more reason, and much more need, than American Jews to identify enemies.

I receive, almost daily, faxes that denigrate the peace process from different sources in Canada, mainly from an organization that describes itself as Concerned Jewish Citizens and operates out of the Postal Outlet at Lawrence Plaza in Toronto.

An additional complication in the Canadian situation has been the competition between Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith as to who is more zealous for Israel and Jewish dignity. Though here is not the place to discuss this particular sad side-show, it is relevant to note that the tension is most acute in the Canada-Israel Committee.

Situational Patriotism?

However, the irony of it all, though painful, should not escape us. When the Shamir government was in power and "peaceniks" in Canada were critical of its policy towards Arabs, many of their opponents accused them of disloyalty each time they voiced their criticisms. Today, when the situation is reversed, the erstwhile loyalists have suddenly lost their inhibitions and are not only critical of the government, but some even suggest that monies previously sent through the UJA or Bonds should now be given to YESHA, the settlers' organization. Is this a manifestation of "situational patriotism"?

The strength of feeling was very much in evidence at the annual pre-High Holy Day meeting for rabbis in Toronto, sponsored by the Bonds organization. For maximum impact, the speaker was Rabbi Abner Weiss, the spiritual leader of an influential Orthodox congregation in Beverly Hills. He concluded his stirring address with a direct challenge to his Orthodox colleagues, urging them to go against the current (!) – and speak for Bonds to their members on Kol Nidre. Please note: A modern Orthodox rabbi has to acknowledge hostility to Israel in his own circles and urge his colleagues to counteract it!

At the same time, and by way of contrast, Reform rabbis received a lot of material from groups of their colleagues and from an organization called The Israel Policy Forum in support of Rabin, urging recipients to use it in their sermons. One tract was accompanied by a letter from the Prime Minister of Israel, couched in uncharacteristically pious tones, which gave Hirsh Goodman reason to remark how strange such words read, coming from the pen of the secular Rabin.

It seems that, in addition to the political divisions in the community and the personal confusions, there are also differences along denominational lines. Because Canadian Jewry is religiously more to "the right" than American Jewry, the mood here is, therefore, likely to be more hawkish, or at least ostensibly prudently cautious. Those close to the present government of Israel find themselves sufficiently desperate to court even Reform rabbis, as I myself have experienced!

What Geoffrey Paul writes about America may, therefore, be even more true of Canada:

> An inevitable result is that the traditional and unequivocal American Jewish commitment to Israel is becoming clouded at grassroots level by the political uncertainties stirred up by leaders who, like a conference of emperors suddenly deprived of their robes, strut around in portentous disorder.

A staff report on The Wall Street Journal expressed similar sentiments recently. Covering the same ground as Geoffrey Paul, she concluded that "some American Jews are finding themselves left curiously adrift – and grappling with an identity crisis." For "American," read "Canadian" – only more so.

Obvious Manifestation of Disarray is Money

In many ways, money has become the most obvious manifestation of the disarray, for money is always the currency of suppressed feelings – in communal affairs no less than in matrimonial disputes. Recognizing, albeit late, that the real danger to the Jewish community in the Diaspora is not coming from enemies outside, and not even from internal strife, but from the lack of Judaism among Jews, many communal leaders have turned their attention to the internal problems of the community. The fact that the recession has starved many of our institutions of funds and exposed some of them to the prospect of bankruptcy – a Synagogue in Richmond Hill a couple of years ago; the JCC in Toronto at present – has further dramatized the situation.

Thus the same reporter in The Wall Street Journal quotes Barry Shrage, the head of the Boston umbrella group for Jewish charities, to have said that "by focusing so single-mindedly on Israel, American Jews have neglected to build a strong, unified religion and culture at home." The report does not specify whether or not Mr. Shrage has civil religion or traditional observance in mind.

The response in the community to the situation that Mr. Shrage identifies has been to create a new buzzword: continuity. There is much that deserves praise, both the term and the context, for they imply that, having heeded the commandment to survive, we now must make sure that we know what to say to the next generation why they should carry on.

But the term continuity has, I believe, also something of a hidden agenda. Looking, for example, at the writings of the most articulate ideologue of continuity – Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of modern Orthodoxy in Britain – it is clear that the term is a kind of code-word for not sending money to Israel but keeping it in the Diaspora. He says so in his recent book on the subject. The British equivalent of UJA has already pledged some four million pound sterling to the continuity project, which has established an office and hired a director.

British UJA has chosen to share its income with the continuity project, rather than enter into competition, probably because it suspects that otherwise collecting money for Israel will be seriously impaired. The fund-raisers, it appears, would rather share the fruits of their labour than lose them – and thereby their Jewish status – altogether. Toronto has produced its own continuity report, demanding a more modest budget from UJA – 1,2 million dollars – and wanting to create its own bureaucracy.

We who have been "in the field" have been talking continuity for at least as long as I have been a rabbi, which is well over 30 years, and repeatedly warned about the dangers of starving the Diaspora of funds. Why has the leadership woken up to it only now? Let me suggest that it is a reflection of the realization that Israel no longer has the desired impact in the Jewish world. In order to keep the old philanthropic structure of the community intact, it is being redirected, at least in part, to serve "continuity."

Zionism

If those who reason in this way needed ammunition for their unrest and indignation, Yossi Beilin, Deputy Foreign Minister of Israel and the voice of Shimon Peres, provided it when he suggested that Israel doesn't need Diaspora money, especially when it is being sent through the Jewish Agency.

Beilin is, of course, not quite wrong. The contribution of the Diaspora has never been an important part of Israel's GNP, and it has been decreasing in recent years, largely due to Israel's improved economy. Moreover, the antics of the Jewish Agency – epitomized by the alleged extravagance of its Chairman Simcha Dinitz, soon to stand trial for misappropriation of funds collected by Diaspora Jews – have really demonstrated that our money may not be spent in the most effective way.

The speech Beilin gave at the meeting President Weizmann called last June in Jerusalem is a cogent argument for the restructuring of the Zionist movement, which deserves serious debate. I hope that next time representatives of the various Zionist Seminars from around the world will meet, he will be given a fair hearing.

Yet, Beilin is also quite wrong when, as widely reported in the press at the time, he wants to do away with much, perhaps all, of Diaspora fundraising. First of all, even if the State of Israel does not need the Jewish Agency, many important institutions in Israel – universities, hospitals and welfare agencies – depend on funds from abroad.

But even more important, Jews abroad still have a need to provide these funds, as long as they can see where they are going and that they are doing good there. Had I been persuaded that if Jews stop raising funds, they will start studying Torah, observe mitzvot and pray, I might be persuaded by this part of Beilin's argument, but I know that they will not. For these people, collecting money for Israel is a means of identification with Judaism, and it is not for Mr. Beilin, or anybody else, to deprive them of it. Civil religion may be insufficient, as indeed I believe it to be, but it is in itself neither dangerous nor evil.

The way to deal with fund-raising is to devise a new mechanism for Diaspora philanthropy in Israel, which doesn't depend on the myth of poor beleaguered Israel, but on the reality of establishing links with important institutions that have much to offer to Jews everywhere. If I have understood the thrust of Beilin's June speech, he would not disagree with this approach.

Furthermore, there are ways of furthering Jewish continuity, as articulated by Sacks and by the Toronto report, while helping Israel at the same time. I spelled out some of these ways in a recent piece in The Canadian Jewish News.

But to do all that, we need a different kind of ideology, and that's where we have got stuck. Since my primary role in life is that of a preacher, I cannot resist the temptation to conclude this statement with something of a sermon. But today, my pulpit is not located in the Synagogue I serve but in the Canadian Zionist Federation, one of whose Vice-Presidents I am.

Zionism needs a new ideological framework. Having been overshadowed for so long by philanthropy, it has lost its bearings. Now when philanthropy is no longer the same dominant force it once was, Zionism needs to be heard again. That's where this group comes in. What we need is something like a resource book on ideology for today's Zionists. I believe that between us, and linking up with our counterparts in other countries – not least Israel itself – we could do even better than Mr. Beilin and his aides.

An interesting contribution, not inconsistent with Beilin's proposal, has been made in a recent paper, circulated privately, by Dan Bavly, a Tel Aviv accountant, and his colleague Eliahu Salpeter:

> As Israel matures and moves on to peaceful co-existence with its neighbours, Israelis should become aware of and willing to take part in the splendid challenge of contributing to the strength and growth of their American kin. It could well be that Israel's attractiveness to American Jewry will, in future, be measured by its success in providing human resources and high calibre, intellectually inclined leaders based in the academic world and high technology.
> If the past has guidance for the future, Jewish history offers us a fundamental lesson: from ancient times there has been a repeated shift of life-giving Jewish creativity between the Land of Israel and the most flourishing centre in the Diaspora. Has the time come for the focus to shift back to Israel?

The answer may very well be Yes. Having given the Israelis some money in recent years and thereby helped to establish our own identity as Jews, the time may have come for us to get some sechel from our brothers and sisters in the land of our ancestors. God knows we need it, for there is little to suggest that we will manage on our own, proverbial Jewish generosity notwithstanding.

Is Democracy Well Served?

by Dr. William Bilek

Winston Churchill once wrote that "Democracy is the worst form of government in the world – except for all the other forms."

Israel sees itself – and has always been described – as the only democracy in the Middle East. Israel's proportional representation governing structure is so democratic, in fact, that no majority government has ever been elected in the history of the State. Instead, a series of coalitions, of greater or lesser cohesiveness, have governed since 1948.

The ongoing debate, confusion, and sharp divisions that are becoming increasingly evident in Israeli society today, can therefore not be ascribed to the present Labour-Meretz-Arab coalition, elected in June 1992. There has developed, however, a change in the intensity of the internal debate, and in the position of Diaspora jewry vis-a-vis Israeli defense and security matters, because of the potential consequences of the current government's actions.

Formal democratic institutions began in earnest approximately 2500 years ago, in Greece. The word "democracy" derives from two Greek roots: demos – the people, and kratein – to rule. It is defined as "rule by the ruled," "Government for, by, and of the people, as free and equal individuals." Early democracy was direct democracy, with the people being consulted and involved in just about all major (and minor) decisions.

Today, however, most democracies, including Israel, function as representative democracies, where politicians, often belonging to one or another political party, present their platforms to the electorate. The people are then free to vote for the party, and the platforms with which they agree, in the reasonable belief that the politicians elected by the majority will be committed to carrying out the policies espoused by the majority.

Interestingly, in a private poll conducted by Professor Efraim Inbar of the BESA Institute, the impression he obtained was that most Israeli legislators consider themselves not to be bound by electoral promises, but rather that they are elected by the voters to carry out whatever policies they consider best at any given time, subject to the people's approval only at the next election (by which time, they hope, most transgressions will be forgotten anyway). This behaviour obviously subverts the basis of the democratic process.

Labour Policy on Security and Foreign Affairs

On issues of security and foreign affairs, the 1992 election platform of the Labour Party was based on the established Madrid formula, and was outlined partly as follows:

1) In favour of immediate talks with the Palestinians on the autonomy plan as an interim solution. Talks will be held with Palestinians from the territories, including from East Jerusalem, but not directly with the PLO. The permanent settlement with the Palestinians and the various Arab States will be worked out in bilateral talks. Regional problems can be dealt with in an international conference.

2) Jerusalem is to remain united, under Israeli sovereignty, as the capital of Israel.

3) The permanent solution will be based on territorial compromise. There will be no return to the 1967 borders, but Israel will be willing to give up, in return for peace, those territories which have a dense Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Territorial compromise is also possible on the Golan Heights. Territories from which Israel will withdraw will be demilitarized.

4) There will be no additional state between Israel and the Jordan River, (i.e., no Palestinian mini-state).

At the time of the election, and even afterwards, the Labour Party described Yasser Arafat as "a negative influence on the peace process, who should be kept out of it at all costs," and declared repeatedly that it did not, and would not, negotiate with the PLO. Indeed, as has been pointed out, it was against the laws of Israel for any Israeli to meet with representatives of the PLO. Some who tried were arrested, and imprisoned.

In spite of this, the Prime Minister and Foreign Minister were involved in secret negotiations with the PLO, leading to an agreement on the Declaration of Principles, before presenting it to the full Cabinet, the Knesset, or the people of Israel, and in direct contravention of Section 8 of the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance. Ignoring the platform on which they were elected, the Labour coalition then voted its approval.

It was Thomas Jefferson who stated that, "The whole art of government consists of the art of being honest." He thought that the only way to guarantee an honest government is to guarantee freedom of access to information by all, and freedom of expression by citizens. "Democracy is communication," he wrote.

Government About-Faces Have Alienated Some Israelis

In Israel, communication has apparently been sacrificed on the altar of expediency, just as Labour's "road of territorial compromise along the Alon Plan" has been diverted to the "Oslo Route". A seemingly endless series of government about-faces and inconsistencies on crucial matters have served to confuse and alienate a significant proportion of the electorate. In June of 1992, Prime Minister Rabin was quoted as vociferously agreeing with a group of Russian General Staff Officers touring the Golan when they said, "...you have no territory and no military, political or economic breathing space – which means you also have no time. In these conditions, to give up the only natural defense line of the bridgehead would border on suicide." Now, he has made it clear that the government is ready for "full withdrawal for a full peace."

The people have been offered a litany of ill-conceived excuses for the PLO's failures to live up to its commitments in the Declaration of Principles. Government inaction in the face of repeated PLO contraventions of the spirit and letter of both the DoP and the Cairo Agreement is termed "in the interest of peace." Despite nominally maintaining its opposition to the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, the government has conceded to the PLO many of the trappings of statehood, making the outcome seemingly inevitable.

One of the most devastating effects, therefore, of this government's term of office, has been the loss of credibility of the Government of Israel with its own population, with Diaspora Jewry, and with the world at large. When repeated denials by Peres and Rabin regarding such things as the existence of secret memoranda on Jerusalem, or the extent of prisoner releases, are proven false by the utterings of Arafat, is it any wonder that all manner of rumours have arisen regarding the government's true intentions vis-a-vis the Golan, permanent borders, and now, even Jerusalem?

Weekly polls show a growing majority of the populace lacks confidence in the government's ability to negotiate effectively with their Arab interlocutors. To calm some fears, a trial balloon was recently floated by P.M. Rabin pledging the possibility of a referendum prior to any substantial withdrawal on the Golan. It was promptly shot down by F.M. Peres, and Party Secretary-General Nissim Zvilli as "anti-democratic." "Labour can cede whatever territories it wants, without asking anybody," Zvilli stated.

Government Fearful of Consulting Israeli Voters

The question of the inability of the official Opposition to effectively capitalize on the government's failures is the subject matter for a treatise of its own, and will not be touched upon here. Suffice it to say that this legally constituted government, albeit in good faith, and undoubtedly with the best of intentions, is perceived by many as having resorted to subterfuge and misrepresentation to achieve its altered policies, and as fearful of going to the people in the face of what it claims are "changed circumstances."

Do these changes reflect a true metamorphosis in the Arab, and especially the Palestinian, perception of Israel, which makes "territories for peace" a viable, although risky option? Or is this simply, as the Nationalist camp claims, an Arab tactical manoeuver, to which the government is responding with an effort directed solely towards total disengagement of populations, regardless of price (resulting in, as Benny Begin terms it, "territories for terror!") In such a scenario, peace and security are described as "a desirable by-product of withdrawal, but not a must."

Lester B. Pearson, Nobel Prize winner and former Prime Minister of Canada, wrote that "Popular participation in foreign policy decisions in some form is, of course, inherent in the nature of the democratic process... foreign policy must not only seek to protect and advance the interests of all the citizens... but... must carry their understanding and consent as well." A significant portion of the Israeli electorate, as well as Diaspora Jewry, fear that the ill-defined plans of the current government may be outstripped by the irreversible outcome of its actions, especially when faced with the unforeseen pressures of world "realpolitik".

JEWISH TELEVISION FOR THE NEXT CENTURY

Another way to approach the issue of audience is in various subgroups.

Jewish children, either at home or school, would be one logical constituency for Jewish educational programs. The growing number of the Jewish elderly and retired population would be another constituency. The large number of Israelis living in these countries might have a particular interest in some of the programs with Israel or Hebrew content. The general core of mainstream identified Jews would comprise perhaps the main segment.

While the major benefits of JTV would flow to Jewish families and the Jewish audience, that is not the full story. JTV would prove to be a boon to Jewish creative artists (and not only those working in television) and journalists focusing on Jewish themes. It could become an important outlet for their work, especially in those cases where it might seem too specialized for a mainstream audience.

What There Is

"Jewish" diaspora television already exists, but its scope is far below what it could and should be. In the United States, in keeping with the localistic and individualistic ethos of the country, efforts are sporadic and uncoordinated. There does not seem to be any all day Jewish television station functioning in the U.S. An early proposal for a Jewish Television network by Moshe Waldoks, published in Conservative Judaism, winter, 1986-87, did not lead to national action.

At best there are local Jewish shows, often non-profit efforts of local federations, often of poor quality and subject to budgetary swings.

In New York there is a program called "Talkline". In the greater New York area alone, about nine cable systems apparently carry the program. Indeed, this one hour cable television show is broadcast by an estimated 100 cable stations nationwide.

An even more ambitious effort is underway in southern California. The Jewish Television Network of JTN, headed by Jay Sanderson, now provides ten hours per week of Jewish broadcasting, with a wide variety of shows. A non-profit operation, JTN hopes to launch America's first national Jewish cable network.

In Canada, the situation is not much better. In Montreal, there are several locally produced Jewish shows available on the multicultural network, and rebroadcast several times each. Despite inadequate funding, the shows are still of good quality and draw an audience. Toronto's situation is comparable, if not worse.

There have been attempts in the past to raise the issue of Jewish television in Jewish communal circles, but without lasting success. Maybe the timing was premature, or the technology not yet in place. Perhaps the potential audience is over-estimated.

Nonsense. Jewish television has barely scratched the surface of the possible. We know this simply because of what else is available out there. In the United Sates, according to the Federal Communications Commission, there are 41 Spanish language TV stations licensed to operate. There are an uncertain number of "black" television stations serving the black community. The Black Entertainment Network coordinates programming for a variety of such stations. There are all manner of other "ethnic" stations either licensed or with applications pending.

In Canada, in 1984, two specialty service networks were licensed, Chinavision (now Fairchild Television) and Tele Latino. Both are private sector operations seeking to become profitable. Fairchild provides 13 hours a day, every day, of Chinese language television to viewers in Toronto, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver. A Fairchild representative claims 60,000 households view regularly, and some of these not serviced by a cable package subscribe directly at a cost of $28/month.

What About Financing?

Could a Jewish television station/network be financially viable? Of course. At the local level the cost of production for the major Montreal Jewish television show (which uses rented production facilities) averages between $500 to $1,000 per hour. For some elaborate programming, such as video coverage of a major communal event, the cost could reach $1,500-1,800 per hour. Of course a JTV could capitalize on economies of scale. Assume for the sake of argument $70,000 per week for 60-70 hours of programming would yield a yearly cost of $3.5 million. (This is a low budget estimate compared to the alternative developed here. It reflects prevailing localistic low cost cable options. A full fledged JTV would be far more costly.)

The CRTC provides data on the annual economic performance, costs and revenues of the two full service ethnic television networks described above, as these are all in the public domain. In 1993, the total reported expenses of Fairchild were $2.8 million, with a profit of $90,000. In the three previous years losses of between $200,000 and $400,000 had been reported. Tele Latino reported total production costs for 1993 of $2.8 million, with a profit of $110,000, though also with a pattern of losses the three years earlier.

The point here is simply to present the order of magnitude of costs involved in presenting a full service TV station to various ethno-cultural communities. These amounts are NOT beyond the reach of North American Jews, whether as entrepreneurs or as non-profit ventures from various Jewish Foundations (operating individually or in a consortium) or communal Federations.

In terms of the multiple benefits of such a high quality Jewish television network, one could argue that the costs could be born as straight philanthropy. But that argument need not be made. For Jewish families would clearly be prepared to pay something for a television service such as the one described above. But how much?

The cost of living Jewishly is already a burden for many committed families. But compared to the costs of synagogue fees, Jewish education and camps, bar and bat mitzvahs, kosher food, or trips to Israel, the incremental cost of JTV would be small.

In most cases these ethnic programs are brought to cable subscribers as part of a package. A JTV could easily compete with a generic (Fairchild) Chinavision or Tele Latino for a spot on a cable package, in Canada or the United States. (In any case the days of such cable packages, which in fact limit choice, are numbered). If forced to choose, how much might a typical mainstream Jewish family be willing to pay for a high quality JTV. Would an amount of $50 or $100/yr., whether as a fee or perhaps donation, be impossible? Such payments alone could generate tens of millions of dollars annually, depending on the audience.

A pricing structure combining fee for service with perhaps an element of subsidization might be worked out, as an alternative option to a strict profit-making approach. Moreover, one ought not neglect advertising income which comprised close to 50% of the revenues of Chinavision and Tele Latino.

Why Not? And If Not Now, When?

Philanthropic dollars are scarce these days. But clearly there exists in the English speaking world a pool of Jewish investors, philanthropists, or foundations that could manage the original outlays. Moreover, these outlays, in whole or in part, might be recouped. What is needed is a plan of action to help the Jewish world maximize the benefits which might be reaped from the telecommunications revolutions of the next century. A grouping of foundations and/or investors, multinational in scope and including Israeli input, could recruit the expertise needed to organize the project and get it going.

The tasks involved in setting up a high quality JTV are well within the financial, technological and creative capacities of the Jewish community.

IS DEMOCRACY WELL SERVED?

Role of Diaspora on Government Policy on Security

And finally, what is, or should be the role of Diaspora Jewry vis-a-vis the elected government of Israel, and the Israeli electorate on questions of defence and security?

During the often stormy years of the previous Likud government, when, egged on by a left-liberal media, world-wide pressure was being exerted on that government to alter policies that it felt were essential to the safety and security of the State of Israel, the majority of leaders of Diaspora Jewry urged public unity with the democratically elected government of the day. The government of Israel needed our support; depended on our support. Groups such as Friends of Peace Now, and others, like-minded, were encouraged to make known their distress at what they felt were the moral and social costs of government policies, directly to the Israeli government, its representatives abroad, or to the Israeli media. These groups were chastized when they were seen to weaken the public solidarity of the Jewish people by urging their own governments to apply further political and economic pressures on Israel.

Many Fear Israeli Shifting Policies Endanger the State

Today, the fear of many is that the current government of Israel is itself unwittingly leading the country to devastating war, and possibly destruction. Suddenly, it is not the question of the social and moral scope of Zionism, or of the make up of Israeli society, but rather the question of the existence of Israel itself.

And, just as suddenly, Diaspora Jewry has begun to recognize that over the last fifty years we, in the Diaspora have incorporated the State of Israel and Jerusalem as part of our identity, and expression of our being. To an overwhelming majority of Diaspora Jews, the age-old question of "Who is a Jew?" has become "What is a Jew, without Israel?" Now, rather than considering Israel's need of the Diaspora, it may be that, much more so, the Diaspora needs Israel.

The bottom line, however, remains unchanged. It is the Israeli electorate that takes the risks, that pays the price. It is the people of Israel who send their children to fight, and die. We Jews in the Diaspora must trust to democracy and leave in their hands those crucial decisions that must be made.

But, the potential, unbearable consequences to Israel, as well as to the Jewish People as a whole, make it imperative that the current government, in the words of Professor Michla Pomerantz, author of Self-Determination in Law and Practice, give the people access to full information, "...complete, undistorted facts and text... to allow reasoned arguments and deliberations on that basis." And then allow the voice of the people to be heard. Only then will democracy be well-served.

Reluctant Cosmopolitans

by Stuart Schoenfeld

As in the United States, there is much public discussion of Jewish continuity, with particular concern about intermarriage. Government of Ontario vital statistics from 1985 to 1989 show intermarriage rates, by individuals, of about 27% for males and 22% for females. These figures are low by American standards, but are much higher than they were thirty years ago. These individual choices mean that 40% of the families formed are intermarried. Many individuals seem genuinely perplexed when intermarriage becomes a fact of life in their own families. So too are Jewish organizations perplexed, seemingly not knowing quite how to respond.

It is possible to conclude, then, that the statistical indicators of a continuing involvement of Jews with Jewish organizations and the continuation of distinctive Jewish practices mask a transition which is taking place in Canadian Jewish identity. In order to explore what Canadian Jewish identity is becoming, the following analysis pays more attention to the trends indicating a marked transformation in Jewish identity rather than those which indicate continuity.

The Meaning of Group Identity in Canada – Past Perspectives

Canada has been described as "two nations", "a mosaic society", and as "a community of communities". There are important differences between the image of Canada each of these phrases is trying to condense, but the images that these phrases speak to, do share some common features. They evoke a Canada where the cultural as well as social boundaries between groups matter, a Canada whose peoples understand themselves in the context of their history and traditions.

These images have their beginnings in the conflict of French and English empires that produced Canada. The defeat of the French Empire left a sizable French population under English control, unwilling to grant a further victory to their conquerors by giving up their cultural identity. The Canadian confederation created in 1867 acknowledged in its founding arrangements the lack of cultural homogeneity across the country and anticipated the continuation of differences.

Non-British, non-French immigrants arrived, coming in unprecedentedly large numbers from the 1890s until the outbreak of the First World War.

For those who dreamed of a Canadian nation rather than a loose collection of provinces bound to an imperial center, or who dreamed of an independent French nation able to bring its citizens into the world unburdened by responsibility for the rest of Canada, the new immigrants could be perceived in various ways. For some, the new immigrants were simply a danger to the dream, as they were imagined to have little interest in the dream of nation, or to be too culturally different to fit in, or to be racially inferior. For others, the new immigrants were imagined as raw material, to be educated, converted and otherwise mobilized around the dream of nationhood.

Yet in a practical way, and even in a tentative ideological way, the new immigrants were also left alone to be themselves. If their cultural differences were not accepted with enthusiasm, they were usually tolerated. The practical need for farmers and laborers was so strong that immigration could not be limited to the numbers which could be easily assimilated. There were even echoes in Canada of Horace Kallen's image of a multicultural society as an orchestra, composed of sections playing different instruments, making harmony together.

Canadian Economy and Culture Dominated by U.S.A.

The context in which Canadian Jewish identity is now being formed has been changed by three trends. First, the Canadian economy and Canadian popular culture have become integrated into a U.S. dominated North American market. Second, Canadians have become increasingly aware of themselves as a people whose future will be made in a global rather than a federal or continental context. Taken together, these trends have established a socio-cultural environment which has implications for the ways in which individual Canadians construct their relationships to groups and the ways in which Canadian Jews construct their relationship to each other.

Despite Multiculturalism, Real Issues Are Global

As a result of the Canadian policy of multiculturalism, Canadians have become aware of themselves as participating in an emerging global society. The English language has become the dominant international language of business, technology, politics and popular culture. Consequently, Canadians have easy access to development in most places in the world. French remains an important language in other places; both the government of Canada and the government of Quebec participate in « la francophonie » – the international gathering of French speaking countries organized by France. Those Canadians who have both English and French, have access to developments in a large part of the world. Global business relationships are also developing, both in the area of Canadian expansion overseas and of overseas investment in Canada.

Global awareness, however, has a troubling aspect. Real issues, which affect the lives and future of Canadians, are global ones. They require, if not global policies, at least local policies which are coordinated and justified on the basis of a global ideology. Issues of pollution, resource depletion and environmental damage, of refugees, human rights and population growth, of economic stagnation and declining standards of living are experienced locally, but are understood to be essentially global.

These aspects of global awareness have implications for Canadian identity. To be Canadian means to be a citizen of one of the more favored countries in the world. Groups of Canadians interpret that fact in different ways. It may mean a special obligation to share Canadian talents and resources with others. This interpretation leads to Canadian enthusiasm for the U.N. and other international agencies, and to the many overseas volunteer programs in which Canadians participate. Or it may mean that Canadians have an obligation to protect their prosperity from the impoverished masses of the third world. This leads to the revival of (so-far) small racist and antisemitic groups, and a general turning inward towards particularistic loyalties and personal agendas. Or global awareness may be associated with the pessimistic observation that even in a favored country like Canada, a long term economic decline is setting in, leading to higher rates of unemployment and downward mobility for many. These are all different responses to globalization; none of them deny the importance of the world context.

Social Mission of the Chosen People Leads to Participation in International Organizations

Jews may also interpret the meaning of Canada's openness to the world in different ways. The humanistic idealism which derives from Canada's awareness of itself as a favored country has elective affinities to liberal Judaism's understanding of the social mission of the chosen people. Jews are represented in numbers far out of their proportion in movements which mobilize Canadians to address urgent world-wide socio-economic problems. Other Jews, struggling to get on the economic ladder or to maintain their toe-hold there, are pre-occupied with personal challenges. Multicultural relativism and a climate of insecurity stimulate other Jews to identify more within their own group. To some, the revival of antisemitism is a reminder of a specifically Jewish vulnerability. Some seek the kind of integral and coherent identity provided by social groups which offer ideological clarity and practical social support. Despite the defections which take place in an open society, the Orthodox community in Canada continues to be optimistic and energetic, and many other Jewish congregations are also centers of activity. Given this variety of possible responses, one might project polarized choices. However, since all the possibilities offer something valuable to the individual, one might better expect fluid instability instead of polarization, with changes according to differing life circumstances.

Among Canadian Jews, globalization also facilitates the traditional awareness of being part of a globally dispersed community. Canadian Jews are numerous enough, affluent enough and Jewish enough to produce individuals who are active in the Jewish issues in the U.S., Israel, Europe, the states of the former U.S.S.R. and elsewhere. These activities are known within Canada and have become part of the understanding that Canadian Jews have of the meaning of their group identity.

The cumulative effect of continentalism, multiculturalism and globalization is, then, the presentation to the individual of a cultural landscape which is experienced as inconsistent and fragmentary, which has many options for identity, which presents all (or most) options as of relatively equal value, which discourages a strong commitment to a particular historical culture, which promotes a way of being in the world in which individuals may either change their understanding of themselves radically over time or go through life without feeling that their identities are organized around a meaningful center of gravity.

Implications for Religious Dimension of Judaism

Cultural diversity also has implications for the religious dimension of Jewish identity. We can teach identification with a religious community to sceptics by teaching that religious communities are beneficial to society and the individual and by teaching religion as metaphor. This strategy can work so long as the cultural environment sets up one functional metaphor (e.g., Christianity) as the standard, leaving religious minorities with the strong liberal argument that they should not be compelled to shift allegiance from one metaphor to another. In the form in which global culture is filtered into Canada, there is no longer a standard religious metaphor. Islam, Asian religions and Amerindian religious teachings are now present in our newspapers, television screens and public schools, where they are all presented as being worthy of respect. How can we teach Jewish commitment to students and families who learn elsewhere that one religious metaphor is as good as another and that it is intellectually backward and intolerant to privilege one metaphor over another?

What are Jewish educators to do as Canada becomes more of a socio-cultural environment in which identity is fragmented, in which there is greater pessimism about individual and collective futures, in which there is a desire for values to live by, but values are relativized?

To some extent nostalgic memories of pious ancestors, guilt over martyrs and pride in a reborn Jewish nation may remain important factors in motivation for school enrollment and in the spirit in which the formal curriculum is delivered. Jewish education may continue to be understood by many parents as letting the child know where s/he comes from, as a response to strong grandparental feelings about group identification or as a means of instilling pride in Israel. The role of these kinds of feelings in the subculture of Jewish education is likely to diminish. However, in young families which are of increasingly mixed background and where the Jewish partner is likely to be third or fourth generation, there are fewer elements around which to build nostalgic and nationalistic sentiments. And as important as Holocaust awareness is, it is not an identity-defining event to the extent that it was a generation ago. When the universalistic implications of the Holocaust are internalized, as they should be, identification can be directed towards a global reference group, rather than particularly Jewish or Israeli one. This likelihood is stronger when the Holocaust is linked to the specter of disasters unfolding now or looming in the foreseeable future.

Implications for Jewish Education

Jewish education may be reshaped around what is sometimes called "the Jewish option" – providing services in the Jewish community which are not only Jewish but are of higher quality than the public alternative. Education will continue to be one of the major social institutions for assigning individuals positions in the class structure, and, in the present climate of insecurity, schooling may become even a more competitive setting than it is now. For example, minimum grades for admissions to Ontario universities went up markedly this year. Newspapers report that students are switching schools to go to places where they can have high marks, retaking courses in order to upgrade, and dropping out of extra-curricular activities. Jewish schools are seen by many parents as settings where their children will be better prepared than in public schools to do well in their later education. In addition to the perceived academic superiority of the schools, parents may also anticipate that the friendships formed with other superior students will support high achievement in school and relationships with other students that will be important later in life. These perceptions have been associated with the shift in enrollment over the past generation from a majority of Canadian Jewish students enrolled in public school and receiving some form of supplementary Jewish schooling to a majority enrolled in Hebrew day schools. Parents may continue to be attracted to Jewish schools on the basis of a superior Jewish option and to bring this expectation with them in their relationships with teachers, principals and school boards.

There may be some difficulty in maintaining the perception of a superior "Jewish option" in education. An analysis of Jewish education in Montreal (Weinfeld and Zelchowitz, 1993: 144-147) concluded that the Jewish day schools, which enroll about two-thirds of the eligible elementary age population and almost a third of the secondary school age population, cannot be considered elitist. They draw from a wide mix of income backgrounds, contain many students from minimally Jewish homes, contain many average and below average students as well as intellectually superior ones, and usually have physical plants which are less adequate than those of other private schools and many public schools. In Toronto, where elementary day school enrollment is slightly larger than supplementary school enrollment, almost half of the local federation expenditures are directed towards subsidies to day school students. In recent years, the amount of subsidy has been capped, with schools reporting that they must consequently cut services, raise fees (thus reducing enrollment), or both. Moreover, innovations have been made in the area of informal education, and there may be some shifting of federation resource from formal to informal programs. The competition to get into university also raises problems for the Jewish option at the high school level. Many students in the Toronto community high school transfer out before graduation so they may focus their efforts on those subjects that will determine university admission. On the other hand, Jewish enrollment in elite private schools was uncommon a generation ago; this is no longer the case. For many superior or wealthy students, the private school option is more attractive than the Jewish option.

Jewish education in Canada may also be transformed by the problem of community, insecurity and relativistic values in the larger environment. Students who live in a fragmented, incoherent, relativistic, and insecure cultural, familial and occupational environment bring into our schools needs for an organizational culture which is concerned as much with identity as it is with information. They need schools which act like communities rather than institutions, which balance caring and mastery, which strengthen families (both as families and as Jewish families), which are at least as well managed as comparable non-Jewish schools, where different stakeholders and units in the system work together, where there is a clear ideological commitment shared through the school, and where value is placed on the spiritual dimension of Jewish identity.

This may be the most demanding option; it is certainly not the path of least resistance or least expense. It implies that schools, in a time of financial difficulty and cultural relativism, should be adding additional activities to work with families, to cultivate a school community and to articulate spiritual values which are lived in the school community. This option poses challenges to Orthodox schools which have been reluctant to confront minimally Jewish parents. They have failed in their attempt, so far, to portray Conservative and Reform schools as standing for something "less" rather than something "different". Day schools and afternoon schools alike will have to ensure that they are more than just schools. This is, however, the only option which responds to the full range of needs which our analysis of emerging structural changes in the socio-cultural environment projects.

IRB ruling upsets community

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some immigration lawyers and officials in the Jewish community are up in arms over what could be a disturbing new trend in refugee determination in Canada: refusing refugee status to Jewish claimants on the grounds that as Jews, they could go live in Israel.

The concern stems from a controversial decision by the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) that denied refugee status to a Jewish woman from Azerbaijan because as a Jew, she could go to Israel.

The ruling, made last November, cited Israel's Law of Return, which guarantees citizenship to any Jew who can prove one Jewish grandparent and states an intention to settle in Israel.

IRB members William Avery and Jack Davis ruled that 55-year-old Antonina Grygorian, who claimed to have suffered anti-Semitic persecution in Azerbaijan, "can, as a right, obtain Israeli citizenship by a mere formality of application."

Even though she has a daughter in Canada, no family in Israel and has displayed no interest in moving there, the IRB found "the claimant has three countries of nationality: Azerbaijan, Russia [where she was born] and Israel. The law is clear that to be determined to be a Convention refugee, she must establish that she has a well-founded fear of persecution in each of those countries.

Israel, Palestinians set talks deadline

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — After months of deadlock over how to expand Palestinian self-rule, Israel and the Palestinians have set July 1 as a target date for completing talks on Israeli redeployment in the West Bank.

The development came as U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher arrived in Israel for a shuttle mission aimed primarily at boosting another track of the peace process, the long-stalled Israel-Syria negotiations.

Last Thursday's announcement of the July 1 target date came after a 90-minute meeting between Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO leader Yasser Arafat at the Erez checkpoint.

At a news conference with Arafat, Peres hailed the agreement as a "breakthrough."

The sides reportedly agreed to a phased withdrawal of Israeli

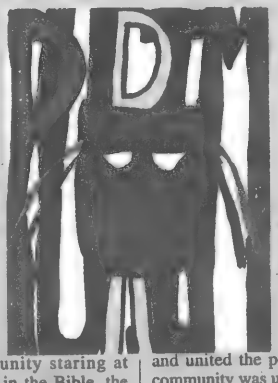
Purim: a lesson in leadership

Editorial

Today is Purim. As with every Jewish holiday, this one teaches us many multi-layered, life-sustaining lessons. Our children, of course, are less concerned with the lessons of Purim than with its merriment and fun. Some will paint their faces, or hide their faces in masks. Some will wear clumsy, ill-fitting, funny costumes. And all of them will be ready during the reading of the story to make earfuls of noise at the slightest sounding of a certain name. Adults will be more constrained during the reading of the Megillah, but only slightly, for this holiday is one of virtually unrestrained joy.

But it is due to the circumstances which occasioned such joy that we should bear in mind at least one of the holiday's key messages.



Purim is an account of a Diaspora community staring at imminent genocide. Unlike in every other book in the Bible, the Divine role in the ultimate redemption of the people here is only implicit. The word "God" does not appear anywhere in the story. Disaster is averted through the judgment, initiative and courage of the community's leaders, Mordechai and Esther.

Purim is thus a prescription for the nature and the standard of community leadership in the Diaspora. Individuals who would be our leaders should be required to adhere to this prescription. The criteria for leadership are found in the final phrases of the story. Mordechai is described as "... a leader ... accepted by the majority of his peers, seeking the good of his people and a spokesperson for peace to all who followed after him."

The text is not merely being complimentary to Mordechai. Rather, it is laying down the essential requisites of leadership: qualifications and credibility (acceptance by the majority of peers), purity of purpose (seeking the good of the people) and purity of means (spokesperson for peace). These are the preconditions for true leadership. The leaders took charge, acted, rallied and united the people. Indeed, the text emphasizes that once the community was unified, no adverse force could stand against it.

For those of us making only slightly less noise than our children during the reading of the Megillah, we should remember at least this one lesson of Purim: survival, rescue, triumph and continuity are the result of true leadership and common, united cause.

CANADA

Plenary Registration

MONTREAL — Registration is underway for the 24th national plenary of Canadian Jewish Congress, scheduled for May 14 and 15 at the Bonaventure Hotel.

More than 1,000 delegates and observers from across the country will convene to elect officers, vote on resolutions and hear from such prominent speakers as Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, former foreign minister David Levy and World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman.

Registration fees go up March 31. For details, call 514-931-7531.

Race Relations Awards

TORONTO — Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall last week bestowed the city's William P. Hubbard Race Relations Award on several prominent citizens, including writer-artist-musician Mendelson Joe, and B'nai Brith member Gerald Rose.

Rose, who is active in B'nai Brith's central region cabinet and the League for Human Rights, served on the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations from 1987 to 1993, where he initiated action against hate literature.

Joe, a well-known figure in the city's arts community, has long led a public campaign against racism and intolerance.

ISRAEL

Rabin at Women's Meet

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin denounced violence and discrimination against women in remarks during last week's International Women's Day.

Addressing female civil servants, Rabin said women still have a long way to go toward achieving equal rights, and he called for more action in the struggle for those rights.

The Centre for Aid to Sexually Abused Women published statistics last week showing that 60 to 120 women are sexually abused in Israel every day, but that only 10 to 20 per cent of them report incidents.

Belzers Celebrate

JERUSALEM — It was a festive day last Monday in Jerusalem's Kiryat Belz neighborhood, as thousands of Belz Chassidim attended the brit milah of Shalom Rokeah, the first grandson of Belzer Rebbe Yissachar Dov Rokeah.

Among the haredi luminaries in attendance were the two heads of Agudat Yisrael's Council of Sages: Gerer Rebbe Pinhas Menachem Alter and Vishnitzer Rebbe Moshe Yehoshua Hager.

Some 3,000 Belz Chassidim flew in from abroad, mostly from the United States, for the various ceremonies and festivities.

Year of Zionism

JERUSALEM — Israel's ministerial committee for symbols and ceremonies has declared the Jewish year 5757 (1996-1997) as the Year of Zionism in honor of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the World Zionist Organization (WZO).

The first WZO congress, convened by Theodor Herzl, was held in 1897 in Basel, Switzerland. The 33rd conference will be held in Jerusalem in 1997.

The Canton of Basel has already announced it will sponsor a series of events marking the centennial.

Memorial for Victims

HAIFA — A memorial was held last week near Kibbutz Ma'agan Michael, south of here, for the 35 people killed in a terrorist attack 17 years ago.

The victims, Egged employees and their families, were on a company-organized outing. The terrorists had originally planned to land by boat on the Tel Aviv beach, but made a navigational error.

Police Commissioner Assaf Hefetz, who led the unit that battled the terrorists and helped rescue passengers, attended the memorial service.

Ties With Burundi

JERUSALEM — Israel and Burundi have resumed diplomatic relations, 22 years after the African country broke ties with Jerusalem.

Burundi, like many African nations, severed ties with Israel after the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Meanwhile, a French news agency reported that an Israeli delegation held talks in Madagascar last week to lay the groundwork for renewal of ties with that country.

Goodwill Gesture

JERUSALEM — In a goodwill gesture for celebrations marking the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, Israel last week reopened 12 sealed Palestinian homes in the West Bank town of Nablus.

The army also cleared roadblocks where stones and Molotov cocktails had been thrown at soldiers.

However, there were no prisoner releases, in contrast to previous years.

Violations Cited

JERUSALEM — Seven Palestinian Authority (PA) institutions are operating here in direct violation of the Oslo Accords, the Peace Watch group reported last Tuesday.

The group noted that the number of PA institutions operating in Jerusalem has increased since the Gaza/Jericho agreement was signed in Cairo in May.

Search for Soldiers

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin says another delegation is to go to Egypt soon in search of the remains of Israeli soldiers who have been missing since the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Speaking last week at a ceremony for Israeli soldiers whose burial sites are unknown, Rabin called on Arab states and the heads of terrorist organizations to allow Israel to search for its missing soldiers so their remains could be brought home for burial.

WORLD

Nazi Groups Outlawed

BONN — German authorities have outlawed two neo-Nazi organizations, and police last month launched a nationwide crackdown on their members.

The government outlawed the Free Workers Party (FAP) and the smaller National List.

Police moved swiftly against members of FAP in nine federal states throughout Germany.

Some 50 apartments and offices of the FAP were searched, with police confiscating fascist flags, propaganda, bank accounts, fax machines and a small number of weapons.

Aussie Centre Attacked

CANBERRA — Thousands of visitors saw anti-Semitic graffiti last weekend when they attended the annual Jewish Food and Cultural Fair in the Australian capital.

The word "Holohoax" was painted in black letters across the front of the National Jewish Memorial Centre, which houses Canberra's only synagogue.

Plaques in the centre's garden were defaced with black paint.

Indyk Confirmed

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Senate last week confirmed Martin Indyk as the new ambassador to Israel.

Indyk, a 43-year-old native Australian, will be first Jewish U.S. ambassador to Jerusalem.

He was a senior member of President Bill Clinton's Middle East peace process team and has served until now as the National Security Council director of Near East and South Asian affairs.

Israeli, Egyptian envoys discuss views on peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Itzhak Shelef

Mahmoud Farghal

TORONTO — The Israeli and Egyptian ambassadors to Canada aired their views on Middle East developments recently in two separate talks.

Israeli ambassador Itzhak Shelef's March 1 lecture was the first in the Ambassador Series held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. His Egyptian counterpart Mahmoud Farghal spoke on March 8, in his first public address at a synagogue.

Although Israeli-Palestinian negotiations don't always make the news, they are ongoing, Shelef said.

"We do meet with the Palestinian negotiators and [together we] solve daily problems. You don't hear about it because these are positive things. We see eye to eye about many issues," he said.

Negotiations with Syria have reached a stalemate, Shelef confirmed. He stressed the necessity of finding a way to "cross the bridge" with Syria.

Unlike Shelef, Farghal asserted that the peace process is at a standstill. (His speech preceded by two days the announcement that Israel and the Palestinians have set a target date of July 1 for reaching a deal on withdrawing Israeli soldiers from the West Bank.)

Despite his claim, Farghal, who has a doctorate in political science, expressed not only optimism but certainty that peace between Israelis and Arabs is inevitable.

"We will achieve it, and we are going to live with each other as one," Farghal said.

The mostly Jewish audience of about 250 people responded with sustained applause, but showed less warmth during a question and answer session, when Farghal was challenged on issues such as the recent banning of the Jerusalem Post in Egypt, the dearth of Egyptian tourists in Israel and the reason why Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak has not visited Israel.

Farghal disagreed that the issues raised typified the character of Israeli-Egyptian peace, which dates from the signing of the Camp David Accord in 1979.

"Tell me about one single incident that happened on the border [of Israel and Egypt]," Farghal replied. "Tell me about diplomatic relations. There are many [Egyptian] officials in Israel."

He called the relationship between Egypt and Israel a "model" of peace, mutual recognition and respect, and said he would resign as ambassador if anyone didn't find that at least 90 per cent of Egyptians want to live in peace with Israel. He acknowledged that "normalization" has not yet peaked, and said controversy between the two countries has been addressed within a context of peace.

Both ambassadors raised the issue of Israel's refusal to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

"We will be ready to sign only after a comprehensive peace agreement [is reached] in the Middle East, including Iran and Iraq," said Shelef.

Both Farghal and Shelef spoke of Israel's desire for security, the former cautioning that Israel "cannot live for good as a fortress," the latter explaining that restricting access of Palestinian workers from Gaza and the West Bank to Israel was a "countermeasure" taken for security reasons following terrorist attacks.

"Collective punishment against Palestinians ... contradicts normalization," said Farghal.

Shelef outlined a four-point policy which Israel has adopted to address peace-related issues:

- to fight terrorism;
- to turn the peace agreement with Jordan into an example showing the benefits of peace;
- to encourage more Arab countries to join the political [peace] process;
- and to continue negotiating with the Palestinians and with Syria.

"The alternative is much worse," he said. "Too much blood has been shed already."

The program was co-sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada and the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda continuing education committee.

Droege receives six-month jail sentence

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

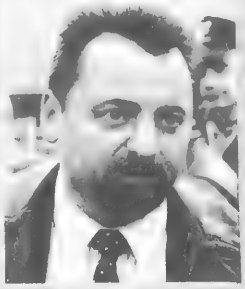
TORONTO — Neo-Nazi Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege was sentenced to six months in jail last week for assaulting an anti-racist activist during a 1993 street brawl.

Droege, 46, was also put on probation for two years and prohibited from possessing firearms and explosives for life by Justice David McCombs of Ontario Court, general division.

Droege was found guilty of aggravated assault last month for smashing Malcolm Sheppard, 23, over the head with a heavy flashlight.

Sheppard, a member of the Anti-Racist Action (ARA) group, suffered a broken jaw and cheekbone in the June 12, 1993 attack, which came during a downtown brawl between members of the ARA and the Heritage Front.

The fight broke out in front of a College Street restaurant, hours after ARA members had trashed the house of a prominent Heritage Front member.



Wolfgang Droege

Aggravating factor

In passing sentence, McComb said that Droege, "as the leader ... must have foreseen the possibility for violence and he could have stopped it. His failure to stop it is an aggravating factor."

Droege and Heritage Front supporter Peter Mitrevski were acquitted last month of possessing a weapon dangerous to the public peace.

B'nai Brith Canada applauded the six-month sentence. "Prosecutors must remain vigilant in their efforts to punish hatemongers who resort to violence to express their intolerance and hatred of those different from themselves," said executive vice-president Frank Dimant in a statement.

Sephardi leader welcomes sovereignty debate

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The head of Montreal's Sephardi community believes it's a healthy development that a new Jewish group will be trumpeting the sovereigntist cause during the referendum campaign.

The formation of the Rassemblement des Juifs pour l'independance by Montreal journalist Ghila Benesty Sroka shows that there is room "for all to take part in the debate," said Joseph Gabay, president of the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec (CSQ).

"As Canadian Jewish Congress said, a vast majority of the Jewish community is federalist," Gabay stated.

But there is also nothing wrong with Jews who are for Quebec independence speaking their minds, he said.

Gabay said it shows that the community, although overwhemingly federalist, does not try to muzzle opposing views.

Recently, Sroka, the editor of the Tribune Juive, launched her group with an appearance before the Montreal Commission on the Future of Quebec.

The brief, presented with co-founder Paul Nathan, a Montreal businessman, supported a sovereign Quebec and called for recognition of Quebec's three "distinct" societies — the native peoples, anglophones and francophones.

Sroka and Nathan also called for the referendum to wait until it is winnable.

But the written brief itself did not address the issue of the Jewish community and the sovereigntist option.

Sroka told the commission that she formed the Rassemblement "out of the urgent necessity to let Quebecers know that other Jewish voices exist in Quebec," even though she concedes that a majority within the Jewish community will likely reject the sovereigntist option.

New group claims Jewish support

Her plans for the Rassemblement are ambitious, including a conference next month open to both sovereigntists and federalists. She even hoped Premier Jacques Parizeau and Bloc Quebecois leader Lucien Bouchard would accept invitations.

Sroka said the conference will be part of the group's plan to show that there is a Jewish perspective outside the "establishment" view and that support for sovereignty crosses Sephardi and Ashkenazi lines.

She claims the support of "more than 100 members" of the Jewish community.

But it appeared uncertain whether Sroka could muster any overall Jewish support for sovereignty beyond very marginal levels.

Individual pro-sovereigntist Jews — such as Salomon Cohen, who ran unsuccessfully for the Parti Quebecois (PQ) nomination in Outremont last year, and Armand Elbaz, a Montreal lawyer and Jewish school president named recently to the PQ's "national committee" on ethno-cultural relations — stand out from the crowd.

Leaders of the Tasch chassidic community in Boisbriand also presented briefs endorsing sovereignty.

But Jack Jedwab, executive director for Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, estimated that Jewish support for sovereignty would not run beyond "two or three per cent."

The Rassemblement is a group "entitled to express its point of view," Jedwab said, but it is a view held by a "very small minority."

Rabbi sues CBC, CNN

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A former rabbi of south Winnipeg's Orthodox Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue has struck back against allegations of sexual misconduct, which he says are false, in a libel suit launched in the U.S.

On Feb. 21, Rabbi Ephraim Bryks, who now lives in Queens, N.Y., filed suit in United States District Court against both the CBC and CNN, seeking punitive damages of $10 million (US) from each of the news organizations.

The civil suit is in response to a documentary produced by CBC-Winnipeg which was broadcast locally and nationally last winter and later rebroadcast on CNN.

The suit names CBC producer Noah Erenberg and reporters Danielle Kesler and Heidi Graham as knowingly broadcasting the "defamatory and libelous matter in a grossly irresponsible manner without consideration for the standards of information gathering and dissemination followed by responsible parties."

After leaving Winnipeg in 1990, Rabbi Bryks found employment at a Queens school for Russian Jewish immigrants called the Torah Academy. As a result of the CBC documentary, he has claimed, he was dismissed from his job in June and has been unable to find another job as a rabbi and educator.

The presiding judge in the civil case will be Judge Michael Mukasey, currently handling the conspiracy trial of Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman and his militant Muslim followers. Rabbi Bryks has chosen trial by jury.

Winnipeg posts reward after school vandalized

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time ever, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) is posting a $1,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of hatemongers.

The reward is being offered in response to the anti-Semitic graffiti which greeted Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate students when they arrived at school March 1.

The graffiti, spray painted near the Jewish high school's middle entrance, included expressions such as "Die Jews" and "88 Brothers" (88 is neo-Nazi shorthand for Heil Hitler).

"We are all angry and upset," said school principal Jerry Cohen. "The students are pleased we have gone public to try to catch the perpetrators."

WJCC community relations officer said the reward was posted because it was a school that was desecrated. "We want to send out the message that we are serious about this and that we intend to take effective action," Hecht said.

Cohen said a garage door near the school was also spraypainted with hate messages and that hate literature was distributed at Polo Park, the city's largest shopping centre.

He speculates the TV documentary Hearts of Hate, aired in Winnipeg Feb. 28, might have inspired the perpetrators.

The Winnipeg Police Hate Crimes Unit is investigating the incident.

Forum examines ways to combat anti-Semitism

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Combating anti-Semitism — both its medium and message — was centre stage during a public forum held recently at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto in Thornhill.

Co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and the Jewish Students' Network, forum participants heatedly discussed how the Jewish community should respond to a rising tide of anti-Semitism and racially motivated crimes.

An annual audit prepared earlier this month by B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights showed anti-Semitic harassment and vandalism had increased 11 per cent in Canada in 1994 over the previous year.

The forum addressed synagogue desecrations, anti-Semitic graffiti, computer hate mail, youth activies like hate rock concerts and Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

Congress' Bernie Farber told the forum it is imperative the Jewish community, in conjunction with other minorities targeted by hate groups, work within the law to combat hate crimes and hate propaganda.

"We must ensure no one is deluded into believing that what these groups espouse is anything but Nazi ideology … one that leads directly to the ovens of Auschwitz," Farber said.

Sara Bergson, 20, former chair of the Jewish Students' Network, told the forum she is disturbed by a perceived public apathy towards anti-Semitism.

"The first line of defence against Holocaust deniers is education," she said. "Getting out to our schools and telling kids the truth about the Holocaust is the best way to combat the lies being disseminated by today's neo-Nazis."

Audience members called in turn for peaceful protests at Queen's Park, quicker prosecution of Nazi leaders and convicted war criminals, class action suits and violent confrontation against the messengers of hate.

Farber suggested a letter-writing campaign to Ontario Attorney General Marion Boyd calling for criminal charges be laid against Zundel.

"It is imperative that we all present a unified front and speak with one voice, loudly," he said.

UJPO rejoins Congress

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The vituperative, name-calling war between pro-Israel and pro-Russia factions that once divided the Canadian Jewish community is over.

The United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), once considered a Communist front organization, has reapplied for membership in the Canadian Jewish Congress and been accepted.

"The Cold War is over, now all of Canadian Jewry is united under one banner," said Congress president Irving Abella.

Abella said he was "happy" with the reunification. "UJPO has accepted our bylaws which support Israel," he said. "It is an appropriate ending to a hostile battle."

In the 1960s, Congress supporters and members of UJPO engaged in bitter debates over anti-Israel moves by the former Soviet Union.

Abella said there was no resistance from Congress' New Fraternal Association to UJPO rejoining the fold. The New Fraternal Association broke away from UJPO when news of Stalin's execution of Jewish writers and artists became public in the '50s.

UJPO, which has about 1,000 members in several provinces, sponsors the Morris Winchevsky school in its own building on Cranbrooke Avenue in North York, and supports various arts activities, including the Jewish Folk Choir. Its auditorium has hosted many evenings of Yiddish music, dance and stories.

The People's Order, founded in 1926, had Moscow-leaning sympathies and some of its members were die-hard Communists, said president David Abramovitz. It joined Congress in 1945 but was expelled eight years later.

"The organization was protesting against Germany's rearmament," said UJPO national treasurer Ben Shek. He said Congress, which favored quiet diplomacy, accused UJPO of being communist.

"We were communist when we were founded in the 1920s. But the organization changed in the '50s when the revelations came out about what was going on in the Soviet Union. UJPO lost its appeal for many members."

UJPO reapplied for Congress membership in 1979 but was turned down because of its policies criticizing the Israeli government, said Shek.

Media Human Rights Awards to be presented in Winnipeg

WINNIPEG — The Midwest region of B'nai Brith Canada has been selected for the first time to host the 20th annual Media Human Rights Awards presentation and dinner.

The B'nai Brith League for Human Rights recently announced that the event, which commemorates the International Day for the Elimination of Racism, will be held here on March 20 at the International Inn.

Awards will be given in four categories — television, radio, newspaper/print dailies and print non dailies, and are open to the media across Canada.

The League presents the Media Human Rights Awards annually to encourage and give recognition for the responsible and effective work of the Canadian media.

Awards are presented for: "Alerting, informing and sensitizing the public with regard to the nature and value of human rights, their interdependence one upon the other, and the ever present danger of their erosion; and in particular, for energetically and persistently bringing forth issues where human rights of individuals or groups are being denied or are in jeopardy."

The awards recognize the quality and content of articles, editorials, programs, broadcasts, news coverage and advertisements.

A panel of distinguished Manitobans has been selected to choose the winners and runners-up in each category. Midwestern League cabinet member, David Davis is the adjudication committee chair.

Present at the awards ceremony will be government representatives; national B'nai Brith leaders; the media; representatives of anti-racist, multicultural and human rights organizations; and members of the business community, educational and policing services.

Israel Asper, Q.C., president and CEO of CanWest Global Communications Corporation will be the keynote speaker.

Media Awards co-chairs are Lyle Smordin, senior vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada and national chair of the League, and Murray Trachtenberg, regional vice-president.

For more information, call the B'nai Brith office at 204-942-2597.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer Fred M. Catzman has been researching their origins over the past few years. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

MANDELCORN

Dr. Mark Mandelcorn is a noted ophthalmologist at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. His name is a deviation of the original Mandelkern, which translates literally as kernel of an almond. Mandel is a favorite component of other names like Mandelbaum — tree; Mandelbrodt — bread, cookie; Mandelstein, stone.

ZABRODSKY

Leonard Brody, of Toronto, reports that his surname is an amputated version of his father's name Zabrodsky.

The name is toponymic indicating a resident of a village in Poland called Zabrodzie, a suburb of Mlawa near Warsaw.

Technion, Russia join forces for satellite launch project

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Drora Kass

TORONTO — A delegation of five Russians, including former generals in the Russian nuclear missile program, visited Israel last year in connection with a joint satellite project being planned with the Technion — Israel Institute of Technology.

The satellite, to be launched March 28 from a former military site in Russia, will assist in weather reporting and serve as a mailbox for ham radio operators.

"It gives beating swords into plowshares new meaning," said Drora Kass, director of the university's Division of Public Affairs and Resource Development during a recent visit to Toronto.

The planned satellite launch is only one example of the Technion's role in the peace process, Kass told The CJN in an interview at the Canadian Technion Society office in Toronto.

"The politicians have signed the [peace] agreement, but it's up to the people to cement the peace and make confidence-building measures," Kass said.

The 47-year-old Sabra speaks with the conviction of one who was a peace activist "before it was popular." In the late '70s she was a consultant for American Professors for Peace in the Middle East in New York, and in 1983 she founded the U.S. office of the International Center for Peace in the Middle East, a think tank established the previous year by Abba Eban.

After 20 years abroad, Kass returned to Israel in 1992 to become special adviser to education and culture minister Shulamit Aloni. She joined the Technion in 1994.

Kass believes the Technion is "uniquely positioned" to play a role in the peace process because of its ability to provide scientific information and cutting edge technology. The university, located in Haifa, has over 10,500 students, six per cent of whom are Arab.

The Technion now boasts the fledgling National Water Institute, established last year to focus on issues such as waste management and water desalination. Technion professor Uri Shamir is a leader in multi-party water talks and bilateral water talks with Jordan and the Palestinians, said Kass.

In another peace-related collaboration, metallurgist Dr. Venice Kamel, the Egyptian minister of science, visited the Technion in December to explore possible areas of cooperation. It was Kamel's first meeting with Israeli metallurgists on Israeli soil.

"Times have changed," Kass said.

Israeli doctors train in Canada

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ten Israeli doctors are now furthering their training in Canada thanks to a fund established by a Toronto family.

The Shiff Family Medical Education Assistance Fund, established at the Toronto Hospital-Western Division by Dick and Dorothy Shiff and family in 1987, provides supplemental funds for Israeli doctors in training or on sabbatical at the teaching hospitals affiliated with the University of Toronto.

More than 50 Israeli doctors have been helped by the fund. The 10 now here are in the fields of family medicine, obstetrics, gynecology, colo-rectal surgery, pediatric cardiology and nuclear medicine.

"We are getting more applications than we can assist and the requests are growing," said project coordinator Dr. Abraham Rapoport, a staff nephrologist at the Toronto Hospital-Western Division.

Rapoport selects candidates with Randy Shiff and Shiff Family Foundation administrator Howard Driman. Candidates, who often come with their families, must be on salary or have fellowships from their local hospitals. The doctors stay in Toronto from one to three years and most return to teaching hospitals in Israel.

Doctors from Soroka, Beilinson, Rothschild, Hadassah, Carmel and Poriah hospitals have taken part in the Toronto training program.

Speaking for the Shiff family, Randy Shiff told The CJN the program is intended to foster "an exchange of ideas and methodology in various fields of medicine. Participants acquire new knowledge and skills, as well as have the opportunity to share ideas with their Canadian counterparts.

"The popularity of the program provides evidence of the tremendous need for such sharing programs."

Why Benjamin's?

Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made. One is being able to talk to funeral directors who are Jewish, for the depth of understanding and the 'feel' for tradition.

Another contrast at Benjamin's is the many years' experience of staff who supervise proceedings to the minutest detail.

On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in the cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.

According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

A counterfeit coin

The Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) is again causing a stir in relation to its views on Israel. And the dust being kicked up is settling on the Board's already weary shoulders in a heavy mantle of discredit and shame.

The latest flap stems from a series of IRB decisions by board member Wiliam Avery, which deny claims for refugee status brought by individuals on the basis of their well-founded fear of anti-Semitic persecution. The proof of the allegation of persecution is irrelevant to Avery. In a twist of logic as shuddering as any propounded by Canadian immigration bureaucrats in the 1930s, he has refused them entry into Canada as refugees because, as Jews, they can immigrate to Israel.

As reported in this issue of The CJN, in a recent case involving a claim for refugee status by a 55-year-old Jewish woman from Azerbaijan, Avery wrote that since the claimant could obtain Israeli citizenship as of right, "it would be perverse not to find Israel to be a country of nationality ... The claimant has no fear of persecution in Israel ... She is not a person who truly requires protection. That protection is available to her in Israel."

There is indeed perversity, but it is in Avery's reasoning. The legal effect of his decisions prevents any Jewish individuals from entering Canada as refugees regardless of the state of lawlessness and the persecution directed at them in their countries of origin. In effect, Avery is dictating to Jewish individuals where they should live, or rather where they cannot live. He is preventing them from choosing Canada as a place of refuge.

Israel's ingathering of exiles is a vital ideal. It is the focus of many of our daily prayers. It is woven deeply and irremovably throughout the fabric of Jewish literature and lore. It sustained the Jewish people through our dispersion.

But the decision on whether to build one's home in Israel or in Canada, or in England, or in France, or anywhere else for that matter belongs to the individual. The decision does not belong to William Avery. That is not the role of the IRB.

Citizenship and Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi was quick to defend the IRB last summer when it accepted alleged non-Jewish "refugees" from Israel. We expect an equally quick condemnation in the present circumstances. Or does the minister agree that Canadian shores should be off limits to Jewish refugees seeking to escape the chaos and the anarchy of the former Soviet Union? The situations are flip sides of the same counterfeit coin.

The divine fingerprint

Recently in the Jewish Week of New York, Rabbi Lawrence A. Hoffman wrote: "There were two cherubim [which dominated the desert Tabernacle] says the Gemara, one shaped like a child and the other an adult, because we know God best in the space between the two — in the distance we travel from childhood to old age, as we look back upon our lives."

The poignancy of Rabbi Hoffman's observation was touchingly affirmed for us by the response from the many children who sent drawings, paintings or sketches of Purim to The CJN. The originality, diversity, sweep of ideas, range of imagination, boldness of image and richness of color were simply overwhelming, a reminder, as Rabbi Hoffman would say, of "the whirl of a divine fingerprint" in the enthusiasm, energy and love of the children's labors.

Of course, children and Purim are as natural a pairing as hamantaschen and mishloach manot. But there is much more to this pairing than educational strategy or parental convenience. It is the millenia-old formula for the transmission of eternal values. For example, the significance of the drowning out of Haman's name in the synagogue, primarily by the children, lies not in the obliteration of the memory of the Amalekite. Rather, it is in the enrolling of the younger generation, even in so simplistic an activity as noise-making, in the cause of Jewish survival. The story sensitizes them to the unique evil of which Haman was the prototype. And sensitized to danger, the children's cacophony is a fitting response. Even they understand that in the face of evil, silence is never appropriate.

To all the children who submitted pictures to The CJN, we say, again: thank you for enabling us to glimpse that "divine fingerprint." To all children and their parents, we say: Happy Purim.

Free Pollard through Gingrich

The Citizens for Justice Committee, under the leadership of Esther Pollard, has toiled indefatigably in seeking the prison release of Jonathan Pollard.

Despite their superhuman efforts, my crystal ball tells me their campaign is doomed to failure. Basically, their strategy has been to seek a pardon from President Bill Clinton who simply cannot accede to their wishes regardless of personal feelings he may have.

Recently he has publicly suffered a humiliating loss inflicted upon him by Newt Gingrich, for the president's attempt to solve the baseball strike. His ratings are extremely low, and so is his charisma.

In view of the above, it is imperative they redirect their energies and seek the help of a prominent American who wields power and authority, and has pro-Jewish sympathies. I refer to Gingrich, leader of the Republican party. He recently proposed that America move its embassy to Jerusalem. This is an amazing proposal. No American president had the courage to risk Arab alienation with such a proposal.

Accordingly, it appears that the best chances of winning a belated pardon for Pollard would be through the good offices of Gingrich, rather than President Bill Clinton.

Arieh Merzer's copper reliefs

I am compiling a catalogue of the works of my late grandfather, the Polish-born artist Arieh Merzer.

His works are copper reliefs of Jewish subjects, particularly the shtetl and the Bible. He had a studio in Safed between 1947 and 1966 and sold most of his work abroad, the majority in North America. I don't have any proper records, only a list of names of the owners which is now 35 years old.

If anybody owns a copper relief by Arieh Merzer or knows the whereabouts of one, please write to me.

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO independent

Congratulations on the excellent article on the life of Henrietta Szold which appeared on Feb. 9.

In that article Canadian Hadassah-WIZO was incorrectly described as the "Canadian arm" of Hadassah. Rather, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, which was founded over 75 years ago, is an independent organization with 17,000 members across Canada. It is a major Federation of World WIZO and is affiliated to Hadassah International, and sole representative of the Hadassah Hospital in Canada.

We are very proud of all our affiliations, but we are proud of our long history as an apolitical Zionist Women's organization dedicated to enhancing the quality of life of the women and children of Israel through its day-care centres, youth clubs, schools, women's clubs, hospitals and WIZO services for women.

Democracies must honor rights of 49 per cent

There is an interesting comparison to be drawn between current political events in Israel and the posturing with respect to the forthcoming referendum about the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin contends he needs only 61 votes of the 120 Knesset members as approval to proceed with the peace process as he perceives it. Jacques Parizeau argues that a 51 per cent vote in favor of separation is all the Parti Quebecois requires to authorize an independent Quebec.

Jews in Canada have a vested interest and a cause for concern with both issues. While of course respecting the prerogative of a democratically elected Knesset, the peace process is somewhat more than a law altering the speed limit. It is indeed time that Palestinians enjoy some control over their destiny but that must be counterbalanced with an insurance that the survival of Israel is not compromised. Likewise the right of Jews to live anywhere must be respected and it is totally unacceptable that any peace arrangements would be conditioned on the expulsion of Jews from their homes.

That is not to say an independent state in Gaza or in some form of confederation with Jordan should not control its own affairs, but it should be a condition that Jews have the same rights to live there as they do anywhere else in the world.

If 49 per cent of Israel's parliamentarians see a risk for Israel or any of its citizens, then Rabin needs more than a majority of one. Likewise in Quebec a one per cent victory should not determine the nationality of 49 per cent of Quebecers against their wishes.

Again, it will be argued that a simple majority should prevail but I would say no if it leads to the denaturalization of 49 per cent of the citizens and a change in the character of the established democratic institutions and freedoms to which those citizens have been entitled.

Both with respect to Israel and Quebec, Jews who are concerned about their future well-being should speak out and let their leaders know their views so a vocal minority does not achieve an unpopular result. After all, the 51 per cent does not represent all the people, but only those who choose to be heard.

Purim through midrash and aggadah

By RABBI BARRY SCHNEIDER

The midrash and aggadah are the ways through which the rabbis, in the early centuries of the Common Era, strove to interpret events and stories in the Bible as well as to relate anecdotes about the sages and their lives.

There are many such midrashim and aggadot about the Book of Esther and the holiday of Purim. Some give us deep insight into the theology of Judaism. Others must be interpreted on a more humorous level, consonant with the celebration of the holiday.

Purim might be considered one of our most important holidays, and the one which will last the longest. Even when the Messiah comes and all the other holidays in the Jewish calendar will be abolished, the midrash tells us the holiday of Purim will still be observed. Rabbi Elazar says Yom Kippur will also remain.

This midrash is explained by our sages in the following way. The biblical holidays commemorate the Exodus from Egypt and even if the Exodus didn't take place, the Messiah might still come and redeem the Jewish people. But had Haman been successful, then all the Jews in the world would have been annihilated and there never would be a Messianic Age. Further, our rabbis taught, "48 prophets and seven prophetesses prophesied to Israel, and they neither took away from nor added to what is written in the Torah, save only the reading of the megillah."

How did they derive it? Rabbi Hiyya ben Abin said in the name of Rabbi Joshua ben Korha: If for being delivered from slavery to freedom we chant a hymn of praise, should we not do so all the more for being delivered from death to life?

We see from this that Purim is a time of great joy and thanksgiving equal to or greater than the festivals enumerated in the Pentateuch.

On the lighter side, we know that eating and drinking are important mitzvot on this holiday. We have a number of aggadot which shed light on just how much our sages ate and drank on this occasion.

Raba said it is the duty of a man to mellow himself with wine on Purim until he cannot tell the difference between "cursed be Haman and blessed be Mordecai." These two phrases have the same gamatria (numerical value). They were also part of an alphabetic acrostic. Under the influence of only a little wine, one could easily mix up the two.

The moment of truth: Esther accuses Haman.
(Pictures of the Bible, Illustrated by Gustave Doré, Harbour Press Ltd., 1988)

In contrast to Raba, who drank lightly in order to fulfill the mitzvah, we are told Rabbah seems to have gone to the extreme with his eating and drinking on Purim.

Rabbah and Rabbi Zera joined together in a Purim feast. They became mellow from drinking wine and Rabbah arose and cut Rabbi Zera's throat. On the next day he prayed on Rabbi Zera's behalf and revived him. Next year Rabbah said, Will you come and we will have the Purim feast together? Rabbi Zera replied: A miracle does not take place on every occasion.

Sending food to a friend (mishloach manot) was sometimes taken to excess. Rabbi Yudan the Patriarch once sent a cut of meat and a jug of wine to Rabbi Oshaia the Elder, who replied: You fulfilled for us the mitzvah of "gifts to the poor." Rabbi Yudan then sent him a whole calf and a huge jug of wine. Rabbi Oshaia replied: Now you have fulfilled for us the mitzvah "of sending portions, each man to his colleague."

It is probably from these stories that we arrive at the custom of light-hearted plays on Purim.

Gluttony and excessive eating is forbidden, except perhaps on Purim. Abaye said: When I went out of the Master's house, I was already full, but when I reached the other place they set before me 60 dishes of 60 different preparations, and I had 60 pieces from them. The last preparation was called pot roast, and [I liked it so much that] I wanted to lick the dish after it. This bears out the popular saying — the poor man is hungry and does not know it — or the other saying, "There is always room for sweet things."

Our sages were politically astute and sometimes interpreted biblical events in light of their own times and knowledge. Was Ahasverus smart or foolish? Rab and Samuel had different opinions on this matter. One said he was a clever king, and the other that he was foolish. The one who held he was clever said he did well in entertaining his distant subjects first, when he threw a lavish party in the third year of his reign, because the inhabitants of his own city could be won over any time he wished. The one who held he was foolish said he ought to have entertained the inhabitants of his metropolis first, so that if the others rebelled against him, he would still have the support of his own city.

Rab said Ahasverus raised himself to the throne. Some interpret this to his credit, and some to his discredit. Some say there was no other man suited for the throne. Others explain that he was not suited for the throne, but was very wealthy, and by means of lavish distribution of money rose to the crown. Has anything changed?

For further insights see the Book of Legends, edited by Hayim Nahman Bialik and Yeshoshua Ravintsky as well as the Legends of the Jews by Louis Ginzberg. Sage Purim advice from Bubbie Dateline Israel . . .

History in the making! A recently discovered Dead Sea Scroll has been secretly translated and the transcripts have been leaked!

In this exclusive, The Canadian Jewish News reveals that the scroll, largely intact, confirms the long held belief that Ann Landers was not the first individual to have made a living with an advice column. It seems that an obscure wise woman gave guidance, advice and wisdom to the people of ancient Israel. Whether or not they listened is a matter of record.

Dear Bubbie

My husband, Adam, he's such a stick in the mud. He never wants to try anything new. He just wants to stay home and work in the garden. I've tried everything I can think of to get him to loosen up. A friend's been teasing me that I should fix him a quick bite to eat then try and get him out to see a little more of the world. What do you think?

Eve

Dear Eve,

Forget your friend's ribbing and stay home. The world's not all it's cracked up to be.

Bubbie

Dear Bubbie

It's my wife. She's driving me crazy! All she wants to do is party with the neighbors. Nag, Nag, Nag. How do I get her to get off my back?

Lot

Dear Lot,

This may be one of those times when it's best to cut your losses, walk away and not look back.

Bubbie

Dear Bubbie,

I've got these guys that work for me that are giving me fits. Complaints and demands are all I ever get. It's too hot, the stones are too big, complain, complain, complain. They have this mouthpiece, Moses, who bothers me constantly. And, if this weren't enough, I have this bug problem that I can't seem to get rid of. Any suggestions?

Pharaoh

Dear Pharaoh,

Sounds like you're under a lot of pressure. You need to relax. Perhaps a little vacation at the sea side would help you. See if you can get away real soon.

Bubbie

Dear Bubbie,

There's this girl, Bathsheva, I can't stop thinking about her. I'd don't think she knows that I'm alive. She hangs around with this creep, Uriah. How do I get her to notice me.

David

Dear David,

Forget her. She's already got someone she's involved with. Find yourself another nice Jewish girl to settle down with.

Lost art of writing ethical wills

My wife and I were blessed with two remarkable mothers, one born on the first of April, the other on the second. They were very unlike one another, and their fates very different. Yet both left rather unique memories behind, and some of these came into view when we completed our recent move to our new residence.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

A few weeks ago I shared with you some of the ideas my mother put to paper. Today it is the turn of Therese Abraham Strauss, scion of the early Jewish settlers in Cincinnati, singer and violinist extraordinaire and a beautiful person of sterling character and high, uncompromising ideals.

What we found is a little leather-bound book, three inches by five inches, gold embossed with a petit-point decoration. It contains nothing but a rather brief ethical will which Therese wrote down 72 years ago, and which retains its potency far beyond the date of its writing. Here is the text she wrote in her flowing hand, with every letter clearly in place:

Self-imposed Ten Commandments for Old age

This is the year 1923. In the afternoon of my life, at the age of 44, I am writing these lines to be read and reread when eventide approaches and the shadow lengthen. By that time, my children will, please God, have reached the afternoon of their lives, and I wish if possible to protect them from the nerve-wearing strain which has been my lot. With the flight of years and the weakening of memory and the failing of the faculties, these resolutions are frequently forgotten. Therefore I am writing these lines to myself so that when I read them I shall remember. Having reared my children in the home of their grandparents without a husband's help and love [he died suddenly at a very young age] my duties have been doubled. If, God forbid, this condition should ever be repeated, I want to follow these 10 commandments which I now make for myself.

1. Never to make undue demands upon their time and attention, or burden them with super-sensitiveness.
2. Never to forget that the love of husband, wife and children is more absorbing and interesting than the love and duty toward aged parents.
3. Not to constantly be reminding them of their debt to me for all I have done for them. Any sacrifices which I have made have been my duty and pleasure, which I pray will be repaid in seeing them mature to fine manhood and womanhood, with fine ideals and high aspirations, doing for their children what I have done for mine.
4. Never to correct my children's children when their parents are present to do so themselves.
5. Not to constantly be giving unsolicited advice.
6. Never to interfere with their domestic keep [that is, help].
7. Never to talk of the good old times never to return.
8. Not to allude constantly to death; when I speak of it, may it be with calmness and fearlessness.
9. Never to interfere between husband and wife.
10. Never to forget that my children are a man and a woman with mature minds and experiences capable of as good and perhaps better judgement in the affairs of their lives than their own mother.

If I can manage to obey this will in my old age, I can be pretty certain of holding my children's love and devotion and preserve peace and harmony in their lives and in mine.

Therese died in 1962, and her inner and outer beauty remains very much with us.

Purim matters

Rabbis note that the Megillah, the scroll which recounts the story of Purim, never mentions the name of God. We are to learn from that, the rabbis say, that God, though invisible and unmentioned, is with us all the time. He permeates our lives no matter what else is going on.

By Erica Meyer Rancin

Any mother could have told them so.

Any mother's routine week includes numerous events and activities that would have minimal survival rates if the unspoken hand of a larger protector wasn't offering constant back-up. Just in the time it took me to draft this paragraph, a 1-year-old visiting us with his mom has climbed across several dining room chairs, one couch, one stroller and a credenza. He has fallen four times when his mom caught him and twice when she couldn't dash fast enough. If it weren't for the hand of heaven, he'd be in traction (and so would she). And that's just in the last few minutes.

The very process of growing up contains more hazards, more pitfalls, more dangers, than even the most protective parents can ward off alone. There is no mention of God, most of the time, in our playroom, but He was surely present the day — four years ago — when our middle daughter, then age four, cut the cord of the hanging lamp with her kiddy scissors in a moment of solitary experimentation. Yep, the scissors with the orange rubber handles, the scissors that now has blackened blades, melted together, fused by a dark lump of instantly melted metal. If that makes you shiver, imagine the impact at my house. If my daughter's finger had been placed differently, by even a 10th of a 10th of an inch ... well, years later I can't think about it without getting chills. But that jolt of electricity never touched our child. We weren't in the room, but He was.

Meanwhile, we forbid our daughter to use scissors until she's 25 and out of law school. At the time of this disaster, I pitched a major league disciplinary fit for her benefit. I must have made some impression. For months, she referred to her pair of scissors as "the bad thing." But we know the good thing that happened that day, and it doesn't have to be mentioned to be real.

Imagine all the other near calamities, from genuine brushes with tragedy to simple annoyance, that would be far worse if one couldn't sense the presence of Divine attention to detail.

Unless you are among the most pious of people, it is easy to take a "leave the driving to Him" attitude, as blithe as the breeze, as unmentioned as can be, except during regularly scheduled services and perhaps a Shema during take-offs and landings.

The exception may be fervent thanks during some internal moments of acknowledgement that obvious disaster has been averted.

Maybe the reason God isn't mentioned in the Purim Megillah is so that we will rediscover His unspoken presence in our daily lives, not just in Esther's and Mordechai's.

If He participates so intensely in our activities, then those activities are meaningful, not mundane, even if what we do all day seems simple, like working, and building a family, and caring about a town, a cause, a career. It matters that we chase small boys off high ledges and try to protect small girls from their own curiosity. And it doesn't just matter to us, it matters to Him.

Privatization of Israeli politics

Many people think of Israel's Knesset as the most boisterous parliament in the world. But few people know that the Knesset is one of the most active legislative bodies in the world. Over the last year, 1,240 private members' bills have been tabled on a wide variety of subjects, ranging from the sublime to the ridiculous. Some observers see the roots of this legislative frenzy in the historic attachment of the Jewish people to a code of law. More pragmatic and even cynical observers view the activity in the more timely context of the upcoming primaries in Israeli political parties. And in the primaries, the name of the game is visibility, visibility, visibility ...

By Shira Herzog

Primaries have transformed the landscape of Israeli politics over the last few years. They are the internal selection of candidates for the list prepared by each party for the national elections. (In Israel's system of proportional representation, the voter votes for a party list rather than for an individual candidate.) Primaries were introduced in an effort to democratize the nomination process and to break the hold of old, vested party interests on secure slots in the lists.

Instead of being appointed to the list by the party's central committee, would-be candidates now compete for the votes of party members to determine their placement on the list. Obviously, the goal is to aim for as high — and therefore as secure — a place as possible. The primaries system has yielded a new crop of talented politicians, but the primaries campaign is all about media access and financial resources.

Primaries are the single most important factor in what has been described as the "privatization" of Israeli politics. In a broader sense, this is part of a slow but perceptive movement of Israeli society from a collectivist ethos in which the group or party or state was the most important, to a more individualistic, North American-style ethos in which the individual comes first. Many of the internal fault lines in Israeli society today can be traced to this ongoing process and the tensions it has generated. In politics, the process has shifted the focus from the party to the individual candidate.

A second significant milestone in the "privatization" of Israeli politics is the recent change in the electoral system that will introduce a direct vote for the prime minister. Starting in 1996, Israeli voters will cast two ballots — one for a party list for Knesset seats as before, and one for the candidate of their choice for prime minister. The bill for direct election of the prime minister is the controversial residue of a failed attempt to introduce comprehensive electoral reform aimed at weakening the disproportionate power that small parties have had on Israeli coalition governments.

Many political commentators have warned of the danger that partial reform will create a hybrid political system — part presidential, part parliamentary — without the clear checks and balances of either. But the immediate result of the change has been an already intense popularity contest among those whom the Jerusalem Report has dubbed "the men who would be king." Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, Histadrut chief Haim Ramon, and former chief of staff Ehud Barak are all viewed as frontrunners, while others waiting on the sidelines will join the race.

The "Ramon phenomenon" is perhaps the best illustration of the profound shift in Israel's political culture. As minister of health, Ramon's national health insurance bill was blocked by the Labor party establishment. Ramon resigned from the cabinet, set up his own party, and in a flash one-month campaign, grabbed the leadership of the Histadrut trade union federation from the old-guard Labor incumbent, Haim Haberfeld.

Ramon demonstrated how the right combination of political skills and personal traits could entice voters to cross traditional party lines and vote for an attractive individual candidate. When Ramon, 44, and Netanyahu, 45, make "I" statements in interviews about the future they want for their own children, they are speaking in a different political culture from that in which former prime ministers Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir spoke grandiloquently of their concern for the "Children of Israel."

As the primaries for the 1996 elections approach, Knesset members of all parties are scrambling for the spotlight. Private members' bills provide them with the opportunity to appeal to different constituencies and to create headlines. The list of pending bills is long and sometimes amusing. They range from allocation of day-care facilities in government ministries to the number of public washrooms for women, from the use of cellular phones in public places to duty-free prices for sunscreen ... Some are serious, while others appear to be wholly expedient.

In the coming months, Israeli candidates for party lists will be campaigning aggressively. Given the Israeli propensity for adopting North American trends with zeal, these campaigns will be at least as colorful as those we see here or in the United States.

In this occasional column, I look forward to following such internal Israeli issues and stories that often determine the shape of things.

Shira Herzog lives in Toronto and works in the business and community sectors in Canada and Israel.

Anti-Semitism — American style

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Anti-Semitism is a universal malaise, but in a country like the United States, where Jews have partaken of unprecedented opportunities for self-advancement, this age-old phenomenon is of particular interest.

Anti-Semitism, U.S. style, is minutely examined in two thoroughly-researched, eminently readable books, Anti-Semitism in America (Oxford University Press, $35) by Leonard Dinnerstein and A Scapegoat in the New Wilderness (Harvard University Press, no price listed) by Frederic Colpe Jaher.

Dinnerstein — a professor of history at the University of Arizona — claims that his is the first comprehensive scholarly survey of the topic. It is, in any event, wide-ranging and accessible, taking us up to the 1980s. Jaher's, by contrast, is more narrowly focused and ends in the 1860s. Jaher teaches history at the University of Illinois.

Dinnerstein's persuasive thesis is that Christian hostility to Jews forms the basis of anti-Semitism in the United States. He does not discount the importance of economic and political factors, but believes that anti-Semitism was instilled by Christian teachings, and continually reinforced by successive waves of Protestant and Catholic immigrants.

Both Dinnerstein and Jaher argue that ambivalance — tolerance and rejection — best describes attitudes toward Jews from the colonial era onward.

Jews were looked down on, and the word "Jew" was a synonym for contempt and disdain. Yet because they were so small in numbers — 1,000 at the time of the American Revolution — they rarely encountered the kind of animus usually reserved for Catholics, African Americans and native Indians.

According to Dinnerstein, America's vaunted image of itself as a tolerant nation prevented the kind of physical violence against Jews that was all too common in Europe. However, he adds, American society was animated by the belief that the United States was, and should be, a Christian-Protestant nation.

As a result, Jaher writes, colonial Jews achieved social but not political equality. (The reverse was true later on.) Thus, anti-Jewish voting restrictions remained in force in Rhode Island until 1842, in North Carolina until 1868 and in New Hampshire until 1877, observes Dinnerstein.

And the best-known politician in the first half of the 19th century, Mordecai Manual Noah of New York City, a fifth-generation American, was taunted as "the Jew" during much of his life.

Yet, as Jaher points out, the picture is not decidedly black. Anti-Semitism was not officially sanctioned or politically institutionalized, and federal laws curtailing the activities of Jews were never passed.

And well before most European craft and mercantile guilds admitted Jews, virtually all occupations were open to colonial Jews. Furthermore, Jaher notes, Jews served as regular army and navy officers (West Point's first class included Jews), and Jewish students appear to have encountered no problems in enrolling at universities like Yale and Harvard.

From the outset, freedom of religion, something European Jews could not take for granted — was enshrined in the constitution. George Washington — the first president — was "the paramount model" for religious tolerance in the United States, writes Jaher.

Despite Washington's disapproval of bigotry, anti-Semitism flourished. Two examples will suffice. In December 1862, amidst the Civil War, Gen. Ulysses Grant issued an infamous order that expelled all Jews from his military district in western Tennessee. Upon learning of it, President Abraham Lincoln promptly repealed the edict. In the summer of 1877, Joseph Seligman, a prominent banker, was turned away as a guest at the Grand Union Hotel in Saratoga Springs, New York.

The humiliation to which Seligman was subjected was symptomatic of the times. In the latter half of the 19th century, Jewish businessmen were hobbled by a campaign of credit discrimination.

Stereotypes were bolstered by the media, Dinnerstein notes. Magazines and newspapers, so reflective of contemporary sentiments, portrayed Jews as intelligent, cunning, clannish, cowardly, unpatriotic, averse to manual labor and guilty of deicide.

Dinnerstein claims that, of all newcomers to the United States in the early 20th century, "the public found Jews the least acceptable." Among the ethnic groups Jews had most difficulty with were the Irish, who ranked second only to the Germans among immigrants 100 years ago.

The Statue of Liberty, signifying the notion of freedom in the United States.

Even a casual perusal of Anti-Semitism in America reveals that anti-Jewish prejudice was a seemingly intractable problem in the first half of this century.

Pseudo-scientific racist thinking contributed to the animosity, as did the widespread perception after the 1917 Russian Revolution that Jews and communism were synonymous.

Fighting a last-ditch battle to preserve their privileges and their power, America's Protestant elite resisted so-called Jewish encroachments.

In 1916, Louis Brandeis, the eminent lawyer, was nominated by President Woodrow Wilson as the first Jewish Supreme Court judge. There was vehement opposition, but Brandeis prevailed.

At Harvard University, the president, Lawrence Lowell, claimed there was a "Jewish problem" because the percentage of Jewish undergraduates had tripled from six per cent in 1908 to 22 per cent in 1922. He suggested that a limit be placed on the number of Jews who could be admitted. Once Harvard took the lead, universities across the country, from Princeton to Ohio State, emulated its example.

As might have been expected, few Jews obtained jobs as university professors. And during the 1920s, which coincided with the publication of Henry Ford's notorious anti-Semitic rag, newspaper want ads were openly discriminatory.

In the period before World War II, clubs and resorts routinely barred Jews. Bernard Baruch, the industrialist, received a letter from the Palm Beach Bath and Tennis Club, to which he belonged as a token Jew, asking members not to bring Jewish guests.

Dinnerstein says the Depression caused "an explosion of unprecedented anti-Semitic fervor." From 1933 to 1941, over 100 anti-Semitic organizations emerged, and by 1938, 45 radio stations were carrying Father Charles Coughlin's scurrilous weekly address.

Not too surprisingly, the U.S. Congress was a haven for bigots. The most outspoken of the lot, Senator Theodore Bilbo of Mississippi, distinguished between "Jews in my state" and "kikes" in New York who wanted to "cram" the Fair Employment Practices Commission "down the throats of the American people."

In two fascinating chapters, Dinnerstein deals with anti-Semitism in the southern states and with anti-Semitism in the black community. He covers the 1915 Leo Frank lynching (the only case of its kind in U.S. history), the efforts by local Jews to accommodate themselves to the system of segregation and the sometimes tenuous relationship between Jewish and African Americans.

In closing, Dinnerstein uses surveys to prove that anti-Semitism has declined since the 1950s. Looking at the current situation, he claims that American Jews "have never been more prosperous, more secure and more at home" than they are today.

Anti-Semitism, of course, still exists. But Dinnerstein claims that in no Christian country has it ever been weaker than in the United States. It's a provocative thesis, but it may well be true.

Jewish World

Books galore

A cornucopia of recently-published books...

Everything, and more, you always wanted to know about the Jewish people is found in Atlas of Jewish History (Routledge, $68.95). Dan Cohn-Shertok's highly useful compendium, complemented by maps and photographs, covers immense ground in slightly less than 200 pages.

The Dent Atlas of Jewish History (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $19.95), edited by Martin Gilbert, is a valuable addition to any Judaica library. Anchored by 132 maps, this absorbing volume highlights major events from 2000 BCE to the present.

The Hutchison Guide to the World (Oxford University Press, $27.50), with its 6,000 entries and 350 maps, contains a plethora of briefs of Jewish interest. A fine reference book.

Jewish art has a long, honorable tradition, the biblical injunction notwithstanding. In The Visual Dimension: Aspects of Jewish Art (Westview Press, $29.95), a lavishly-illustrated book, a distinguished group of essayists dissect and analyse this topic.

The wisdom of the ages is at your finger tips in Jewish Wisdom: A Treasury of Proverbs, Maxims, Aphorisms, Wise Sayings and Memorable Quotations (Ballantine, $4.99 US).

Economic Origins of Anti-Semitism: Poland and its Jews in the Early Modern Period (Yale University Press, $17 US) skillfully traces the position of the Jewish community from the end of the 16th century to Poland's demise as an independent state in 1795. Academic in tone, it's by Hillel Levine, a Boston University sociologist.

Canada's Jews (McGill-Queen's University Press, no price listed) was originally written by Louis Rosenberg, and published by the Canadian Jewish Congress in 1940. Long out of print, this fascinating book is now available in a facsimile edition, with an illuminating introductory essay by McGill professor Morton Weinfeld.

Sweatshop Strife: Class, Ethnicity and Gender in the Jewish Labor Movement of Toronto (University of Toronto Press, $19.95) deftly explores a subject that is seldom addressed in Canada. Drawing on forgotten records, and her knowledge of Yiddish, Ruth Frager produces a work of considerable acumen.

The son of immigrant parents, Abe Fortas was a brilliant lawyer, confidant of President Lyndon Johnson and Supreme Court justice. In Abe Fortas (Yale University Press, $29.95), biographer Laura Kalman focuses on the legal scholar rather than the man. The approach is perfectly legitimate, but intimidating to the average reader.

There has been an upsurge of neo-Nazi violence in Germany since German reunification in 1990. The New Reich (Random House, $30), written by Michael Schmidt, examines this phenomenon and profiles its principal leaders in vivid impressionistic fashion.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

On Purim we read the Megillah, give matanot l'evyonim (charity to the poor), send mishloach manot (parcels of food to our friends), and have a special seudah (Purim feast). The Megillah and the Purim holiday have many special lessons for us. I would like to share one of those with you.

Recently, on the weekend of Shabbat Parshah Pekudei, March 3 to 4, I addressed the annual national convention of the leaders of Bnos Agudas Israel.

I expounded and elaborated upon the fact that, and explained how their contribution to Jewish life was of such paramount importance. I quoted the verse in Daniel (12:3), "... and those that bring merit and good influence to the public (matzdikei horabim), are as stars that shine forever."

Jews seem insignificant in number in world population figures: their land is tiny; they are alone in their traditions and heritage. But their contribution to the world is enormous.

Similarly, each girl should realize that her contribution is enormous. She may think to herself that getting together with a few younger girls on Shabbat to teach them Torah, won't make such a vast difference in the greater scheme of things.

But that's not true. Even if she influences the life of one Jewish girl, she has fulfilled the Talmudic dictum "that whoever saves one life in Israel, is considered to have saved an entire world."

I also exhorted them to look in this manner at the girls in their group. Each may appear as a young insignificant individual, a mere speck of a star. But each Jewish girl has the potential of becoming a shining star on the horizon, larger than the world itself.

Did not one woman in our recent history, Sarah Schneirer, single handedly revolutionize the Jewish education of girls, by starting what is now the vast Bais Yaakov movement of Torah schools for girls all over the globe?

All people are individuals, with their own talents, their own minds, their own personalities. What each one is, what each one does, makes a difference in the world. Each has his or her own contribution to make; their potential is uniquely stamped upon them by their Creator.

And to bring home this point I told them the following story.

A teacher in New York decided to honor her seniors in high school by letting them know the difference they each made. She called each student to the front of the class, one at a time. First she told them how they made a difference to her and the class. Then she presented each one with a blue ribbon upon which was imprinted with gold letters the words, "Who I Am Makes a Difference."

Then the teacher decided to follow up with a class project to see what kind of impact recognition would have on their community.

She gave every student three more ribbons and asked them to go out and spread this acknowledgement ceremony to members of the community. They were to keep track of the results and report back to the class in about a week.

One of the boys in the class went to a junior executive in a local company and honored him with a ribbon for helping him with his career planning. After pinning the ribbon on this executive, he gave him two extra ribbons and explained that they were doing a class project on recognition.

Would he please find someone to honor in a similar manner, the student asked, and give that person an extra ribbon (beside the one he would pin on personally), so that a third person could be acknowledged in a continuation of the ceremony. The boy would follow up in a week or so.

Later that same day the executive went to see his boss, a fellow who was known to be quite a grouch, but whom he admired greatly for being a creative genius, and someone from whom he had learned much. The boss was quite surprised but very touched at this unexpected recognition and allowed the man to pin the blue ribbon on his jacket.

That night the boss came home to his 14-year-old son, sat him down and told him of the experience with his junior executive.

"Imagine, he told me he admired me for my creative genius and pinned this ribbon on me that says, 'Who I Am Makes a Difference.' He also gave me this extra ribbon and asked me to find my special person to honor.

"As I was driving home tonight, I started thinking who I would honor and I thought about you. My days are really hectic and I know that when I come home I don't pay a lot of attention to you. Sometimes I reprimand you for not getting good enough grades in school and for keeping your room in such a mess.

"But I want you to know that besides your mother, you are the most important person in my life. You're a great kid. I love you and I want to pin the ribbon on you!"

The startled boy broke out in uncontrollable sobs. He looked up at his father and through his tears uttered the following words:

"I want you to know, Dad, that I was planning on committing suicide tomorrow because I didn't think you loved me. I guess I don't need to do that anymore!"

On Purim we send our friends the mishloach manot which lets them know we treasure their friendship and that they make a difference to our lives. What a lesson! Let's learn it well. Purim somayach!

A joyous festival

By RABBI DAVID J. GOLDBERG

Purim is truly the most joyous festival in the Jewish calendar. At what other holiday can one eat, drink (even to excess), wear a costume in the synagogue (as well as make lots of noise during services), and give gifts and receive them? And we re-enact the event through the reading of Megillat Esther.

American Rabbi Yitz Greenberg has called Purim "the holiday of the Diaspora," and for good reason. First of all, the events of the Purim story take place outside the land of Israel. This is the only Jewish holiday where not only do the events occur in the Diaspora, but there is not even any longing to return to the land of Israel. Judah is mentioned only once, as the home of Mordechai's forebears.

The omission of anything to do with a return to the Holy Land can lead us to make a good case, as Rabbi Greenberg does, that the Jews of Shushan, especially Mordechai and Esther, were assimilated Jews. Let us look first at their names. Today Mordechai and Esther are thought to be very Jewish names. But like Moses, whose name came from the Egyptian language, their names came from the Persian civilization. Esther is related to Ishtar, a Babylonian goddess, and Mordechai came from Marduk, a Babylonian god.

Then there is the fact that Esther entered a contest to marry a gentile king. Today we lament the fact that many of our young Jews are intermarrying. Yet the heroine of the Purim story marries a gentile and the author is silent about this break with Jewish custom and law.

And the Jews of Persia also reacted to Haman's threats as assimilated Jews. They looked the other way and hoped that he would soon go away. What they finally earned much to their disbelief was that it could happen in Persia where the Jews were quite comfortable and safe.

The Jews felt more Persian than Jewish. But the Talmud tells us that removal of Ahashverush's ring (which was given to Haman as a sign that his genocide plan was legal and acceptable) "accomplished more than [all] 48 prophets and seven prophetesses who prophesied to the Jews [in the First Temple period]."

During the time that the First Temple stood, the Jews were divided into two kingdoms, Israel and Judah. They acted like two distinct peoples and often went to war against each other.

The serious message of Purim is that we are all one people, whether we are threatened or not. It should not take a Haman to bring us together. We stand much stronger and ensure our survival when we live together in peace, talking with one another, cooperating with one another and sharing our Jewish lives with one another no matter where we live or where we pray.

For if we stand united when our lives are at peace, then we shall stand together even stronger and more united when they are threatened. Amidst all the fun and frivolity of Purim, may this message enter our hearts.

Rabbi David Goldberg is the assistant rabbi at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal.

Jewish Life

On noise and silence

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Last year, the raucous noise which I associate with the frivolity and joy of Purim was shattered by the news of the terrible killings in Hebron of Muslims at prayer in the mosque built over the tombs of the founders of Judaism. Throughout the world, Jews reacted to the actions of Dr. Baruch Goldstein with shock and considerable soul-searching.

GUEST VOICES

In the aftermath of that event, my synagogue created a forum for reflection on what had occurred. In a public dialogue with me shortly after this heinous deed, Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, whose exposition of Torah enriches all who know him, condemned the act, but sought to explain the pain, fear and anxiety which brought about this abberant deed.

In a Shabbat lecture later in the spring, our guest scholar, Rabbi David Novack, condemned any effort to justify Goldstein's actions. This eminent Torah scholar and professor of religious studies declared that the slaughter and its perpetrator were completely outside the bounds of Jewish teaching and tradition. I share his belief that no explanation can remove the stain of such a vile act.

Indeed, most Jewish leaders echoed the words of Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein, the rosh yeshivah of the Talmudic Academy in Har Etzion (which is located in Judea and whose students combine service in the Israel Defence Forces with intensive study of Torah). He wrote:

"I must vigorously protest against what happened last night before all of Israel and the entire world. A person, whatever his previous merits may have been, departed this world while engaged in an act of awful and terrible slaughter and thereby, beyond the crime itself, desecrated the name of Heaven, trampled on the honor of the Torah and commandments, soiled and sullied the image of the community of Israel and endangered the future of [Jewish] settlement in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. This man won praise and honor in the yeshivah of his hometown, in Kiryat Arba, and was eulogized with full ceremonial honor by his rosh yeshivah. Woe to the ears that hear this! But, if it has been decreed that we must hear it, at least there should be a clear protest which expresses not only disassociation, but also disgust and shock. We must do so, not to preserve our public image, but to preserve our self-image. May the One who, 'being merciful, forgives all iniquity' [Psalm 78:38], 'remove the shame of His people over all the earth' [Isaiah 25:8]."

Since last February, magazines and journals representing a wide spectrum of Jewish thought and opinion have reviewed and confronted the elements of the Torah tradition which dishonor the outsider. We have sought to emphasize those aspects of our sacred teaching which call upon Jews to protect the stranger and to honor those who differ from us. While concerned about ongoing issues of personal security within Israel, we have not hesitated to continually question ourselves and to seek to purify our tradition by reinterpreting the vestiges of confrontation and conflict which were part of the formative religious identity of the Jewish people.

As Rabbi Lichtenstein indicated, we engage in these efforts of self-analysis for our own sake, not for the purposes of publicity or external image-making. While there are extremists within the Jewish community, they are far outnumbered by those who want to hear and absorb a message of reconciliation.

It is noteworthy, however, that, to the best of my knowledge, similar soul searching has not taken place within the Islamic community after the evil acts of Islamic Jihad and Hamas have claimed Jewish lives. Jews know that all Muslims should not be condemned for the acts of these extremists, but we are waiting for the voices of significant Islamic leaders instructing their followers that deeds of violence which injure the innocent are not taught or encouraged by the Koran. Alas, I fear there is not a community which yearns to hear such messages.

Moreover, I do not believe the news media care about the absence of the expression of such sentiments by Muslims. When the print and electronic media recapitulate the story of Hebron, seeking to remind the world of this terrible deed, it is appropriate to ask whether they will give similar attention to the anniversaries of the slaughter of Jews.

There are many lessons to be learned from the acts of last February. One of them is that if we ever hope to live in peace, then religious leaders must find the courage to condemn such killings. Another is that the followers of the different traditions must begin to speak up and indicate they crave to hear traditional religious and ethical instruction which will inspire the pursuit of peace and eschew the path of violence. The silence is deafening.

Jewish tape library to open in Ottawa

OTTAWA — A new tape library carrying thousands of Jewish titles and topics is set to open to the public in the spring of 1995.

The Jarvis Freedman Torah Tape Library, located in the Jewish Youth Library at 192 Switzer Ave., was established by the Freedman family in memory of the late Jewish education supporter Jarvis Freedman, who died in 1985.

The Torah Tape Library is for those who find it easier to listen to a tape on a particular Jewish subject than open a book. The English-language tapes include new translations of classical Jewish texts.

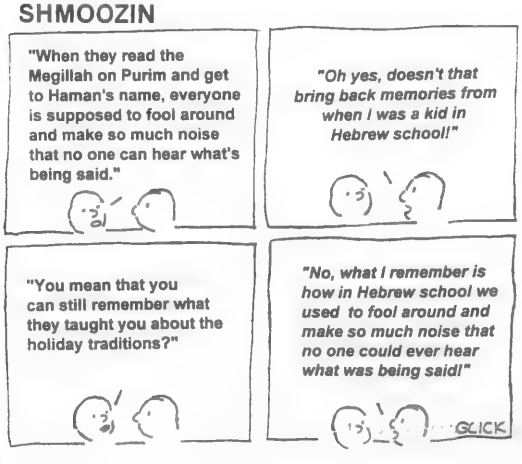
SHMOOZIN



"When they read the Megillah on Purim and get to Haman's name, everyone is supposed to fool around and make so much noise that no one can hear what's being said."
"Oh yes, doesn't that bring back memories from when I was a kid in Hebrew school!"
"You mean that you can still remember what they taught you about the holiday traditions?"
"No, what I remember is how in Hebrew school we used to fool around and make so much noise that no one could ever hear what was being said!"

Tay-Sachs screening held for Orthodox community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Members of the local Orthodox community are making a concerted effort to eradicate the scourge of Tay-Sachs disease through a program of discrete mass genetic screening.

Tay-Sachs disease is a hereditary, degenerative disease of the brain which culminates in death by age 4.

Symptoms like paralysis, blindness and dementia appear within three or four months of birth.

One in 25 Ashkenazi Jews is a carrier of the Tay-Sachs gene.

Students at three Toronto-area Orthodox schools are now being screened for the Tay-Sachs gene in order to prevent two carriers from marrying.

The screening program, now in its fourth year, is run by Chevra Dor Yeshorim, a New York-based organization whose executive director is Rabbi Shmuel Eckstein. It offers genetic disease counselling in the U.S., Canada, Israel and Europe.

Grade 12 students at Toronto's Bais Yaakov High School and post-secondary yeshivah students at Ner Israel and Yeshiva Gedolah of Toronto are routinely tested for the Tay-Sachs gene by means of a simple blood test. There is a nominal charge.

The blood samples, which organizers estimate have numbered nearly 200, are taken to the Centre for Jewish Genetic Diseases associated with Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York, where the results are entered into a central computer.

Before participants begin to date, they can call a free central phone number — each participant is identified by number, not name — to find out whether they are genetically compatible.

The Tay-Sachs gene, explains Dr. Joe Clarke, head of clinical genetics at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, is recessive. That means both parents must carry the gene for the offspring to be at risk of developing the disease. If only one is a carrier, there is no chance whatsoever of a child being at risk.

Individual carrier status is not given out by Dor Yeshorim: even parents are not given that information. This, explains a spokesperson for Dor Yeshorim, is to avoid the very real psychological problems that have been identified in people told they are carriers, even when it is explained to them the status carries no stigma, and, indeed, is irrelevant unless they marry another carrier.

While it is possible in Toronto to be tested at no cost at the Tay-Sachs clinic at the Hospital for Sick Children any Tuesday afternoon between 12 noon and 1 p.m., and again from 2 until 4:30 p.m. (416-813-5896), the Orthodox community feels Dor Yeshorim offers more privacy and less potential for embarrassment.

In the United States, Europe and Israel, it is almost routine, the spokesperson said, for Orthodox young people contemplating marriage to call Dor Yeshorim.

As an added service, young people are now being screened for the cystic fibrosis gene, another genetically caused disease.

For more information about the program, contact Shelly Botnick at 416-256-0081.

Women to be honored

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The annual Week of the Jewish Woman dinner — for women only, hosted by N'Shei Chabad Lubavitch Women's Organization of British Columbia, will be held at the Four Seasons Hotel March 21.

The dinner honors Jewish women in the Lower Mainland community "for outstanding contribution and distinction in various fields," according to Lubavitch.

Honored in previous years have been women active in the arts and the health professions, and Holocaust survivors. This year, the six women honorees "have unselfishly volunteered time and energy to several Jewish organizations," says Lubavitch.

The women being honored are Trudi Ben Ami of Emunah Women of Canada, Lois Hammer of Na'amat, Shirley Kort of the National Council of Jewish Women, Tillie Kositsky of B'nai Brith Women, Joyce Lowe of the Hadassah-WIZO Council and Helene Rosen of ORT.

Tracey Schonfeld is master of ceremonies and a performance by children will be introduced by Shirley Barnett and narrated by Karla Marx.

The city of Vancouver annually proclaims the Week of the Jewish Woman.

Lubavitch acquires a new site

TORONTO — Chabad Lubavitch of Markham has acquired a 1.6-acre site at 83 Green Lane in Thornhill on which to build a new home.

The 30,000-sq.ft. Chabad Synagogue Centre will include a sanctuary, social hall, classrooms, offices, a mikvah and a hospitality room, for guests who want to stay within walking distance of a shul.

It will accommodate the existing programs, including a preschool, Hebrew School, and youth and adult education programs.

A recent meeting of the general membership approved the plans, and agreed to a $1.5-million fundraising campaign.

The project is dependent on rezoning, site plan approval and the raising of the necessary funds.

President David Wiener said he is confident that these contingencies will be met.

Catholic paper backs funding for Jewish schools

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Catholic biweekly newspaper has come out strongly in favor of public funding for schools operated by other religious faiths, including Jewish day schools.

In an editorial headed Educational justice can't be only for Catholics, the Catholic New Times, in its Feb. 19 issue, comments on the four-volume Ontario Royal Commission on Learning report which praised funding for Catholic schools but made no recommendation in extending funding to other faiths.

"It is ethically unsustainable for Catholics to go on accepting such generous public support for our educational system when Jewish parents, Protestant-Christian parents, Muslim parents — those are only some of the groups already seriously concerned — are without public funding. The contrast in treatment is so inequitable that it is a scandal."

The editorial concludes: "Not for one year, not even for a day, should the Catholic community in Ontario rest on its laurels until our sisters and brothers in other faith communities are treated as justly as the Royal Commission wants to treat Catholics."

The Supreme Court of Canada has agreed to hear an appeal of a lower court decision which denied funding to Jewish religious schools. It is expected the appeal will be heard in late 1995.

"We're very pleased with the editorial," said Murray A. Segal, chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education.

"The Catholics have always been supportive of our position," he said. "This editorial confirms what they have said before in their internal publications."

Learning centre opens

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Observing Jewish laws and rituals will improve and refine both human beings and society, asserts Rabbi Mordechai Becher, senior lecturer at Ohr Somayach.

Rabbi Becher was speaking to a standing room crowd at the opening of the organization's newest branch, the Temmy Latner Learning Exchange at 446 Spadina Rd., in the Forest Hill area.

Several of those present said they had come because of the tantalizing title of his speech: Torah and the art of motorcycle maintenance.

Rabbi Becher explained that, just as assembling a motorcycle requires instructions and attention to detail, so too does leading a Torah observant lifestyle.

Judaism, he said, is a religion of law, instruction, prohibition and obligation, divided into 248 positive and 365 negative commandments.

Nobody is obligated to fulfil all those 613 commandments, he said. "You would have to be a man and a woman, married, divorced and single, a Cohen and a Levi."

Rabbi Avram Rothman, Ohr Somayach executive director, affixed a mezuzah to the main room.

The centre, Rabbi Breitowitz said, will be not just a place for learning, but a "place for Jewish life — someplace to meet, eat, drink and share good thoughts."

Torah study, charity planned for Purim

TORONTO — Jews around the world are being asked to join in special gatherings marked by Torah study, charity and acts of kindness during Purim and the Fast of Esther which precedes it.

Achdut Yisroel International, an ad hoc group formed to organize this effort, hopes that "in the wake of unprecedented bloodshed and tragedies in Israel and elsewhere, this act of unity will lead to the promised age of universal peace and redemption," a press release explains.

Among rabbinic leaders calling for this event are Rabbi Pinchus Hirschprung, chief rabbi of Montreal; Rabbi Reuven Poupko of the Rabbinical Council of Canada; and former Israeli Sephardi chief rabbi Mordechai Eliyahu.

The gatherings are supported by Esther Waxman, whose son Nachshon, a soldier in the Israel Defence Force, was killed by Hamas terrorists earlier this year, and Devorah Halberstam, whose son Ari was killed when the bus he was riding in was attacked by terrorists.

Gulko looks back on rich life at 100 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I may be old, but I ain't dumb," a feisty Nancy Gulko said last week.

Gulko will celebrate her 100th birthday this week. Born March 16, 1895, in Birmingham, England, she remembers the cries of young boys hawking newspapers announcing the death of Queen Victoria.

As one of nine children of Lazar Berkovitz, a Russian-born confectioner and his German wife Eva, young Nancy grew up in a "poor but happy" home with a coal stove in the kitchen, a fireplace to heat every room and a single faucet outside the house.

Her parents taught Nancy and her siblings, of whom only she and brother David Burkes, 95, are still alive, "never to thieve or be jealous of anyone who had more than you. My father, especially, taught us the right way to live. We were very poor, but we were honest people."

Jewish holidays found the Berkovitz family at the large Singers Hill Synagogue, where the wealthier men of the community wore top hats. She had no formal Jewish education as a child because "girls didn't go to cheder in those days."

Gulko attended public school until age 11, then helped in the family confectionery business before emigrating to Toronto with her parents as a teenager.

Nancy Gulko

"I wanted very much to go to high school," she said in an interview at Cheltenham Nursing Home, which has been her home since she broke her hip in 1991.

Gulko never realized her early ambition of becoming a short story writer. As a child, she consistently won first prize for school essays and had stories published in local children's magazines, she said.

"Just going through life is a story. You set sail, and sometimes you have clear sailing, but other times the boat rocks."

As things turned out, she married at 21 and focused on raising a family. Her husband Morris, a Russian-born melamed who turned to factory work to make a living, was "a very good man," Gulko said. He died in 1980 after 62 years of marriage.

The wedding ceremony was held at the Berkovitz home, and Gulko wore a custom-made grey satin gown. When her daughters Helen (Baltman) and Evelyn (Katz) were young, she had the dress remade for them.

Gulko also has two sons, Norman and Harris David, who lives in Israel. The family has grown to include 14 grandchildren and 16 great-grandchildren.

A gregarious woman, Gulko used to hold a weekly Saturday open house where family and friends would gather for tea, cake and conversation. This week, a similar gathering is planned for her birthday.

Gulko still enjoys chatting and sharing a good joke, but has little patience for some of the "garbage" she sees on television. "How people can sit and watch those shows ..." she begins, then makes a dismissive gesture and instructs, "Just say I'm an old crab."

Gulko likes to watch the news and believes the government should pay mothers to stay home with their children.

"I think I'm still sensible," Gulko said. She is grateful to be able to walk and talk, both of which she does with relative ease, although she relies on a walker for support.

A lifelong non-smoker and non-drinker, Gulko has a succinct answer when asked the secret of her longevity. "Breathing."

Centre aids disabled veterans

By CYNTHIA GASNER

TORONTO — The recent opening of the Jerusalem Beit Halochem rehabilitation centre for disabled war veterans marked a significant milestone for Joseph (Yoske) Luttenberg.

Luttenberg, Israeli chair of the Zahal Disabled Veterans Organization, was paralyzed in one arm after heavy fighting around Jerusalem during the War of Independence.

Only 19 at the time, Luttenberg spent two years in Tel Hashomer Hospital. "Nobody knew how to deal with 6,000 disabled soldiers," he told The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto. "We just spent idle time without much rehabilitation."

Lutttenberg and a group of fellow wounded veterans went to the government of David Ben-Gurion to get help for those like them.

Since then, Zahal has grown to include 40,000 members. "New members join our ranks every day," Luttenberg said. The Israeli government funds some 20 per cent of the rehabilitation programs.

In addition to the newly opened Beith Halochem centre in Jerusalem, the organization has rehabilitation facilities in Tel Aviv and Haifa, and a 200-bed rest and recreation centre in Naharia. Beit Halochem facilities offer sports, recreation, rehabilitation and social setting for the veterans, their families and friends.

Luttenberg says membership at the new Jerusalem centre has grown passed the projected 1,500.

The next Zahal project will be an old age home.

Russian couples to 'tie the knot' at BAYT

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Almost 800 people are expected to witness what organizers have termed "the happiest day of the year" for 10 Russian couples who will be married under a chupah.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, spiritual leader of the Jewish Russian community says the June 13 gala wedding for these couples, who were unable to have a religious wedding in Russia, will be held at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto. Each couple will have a chupah and two rabbis in attendance.

"There are weddings performed throughout the year but this is a special celebration. This is our fourth gala wedding, and after each we have had an influx of people who want to be married under the chupah," Rabbi Zaltzman said.

He said for Canadians, being married under the chupah is natural, but to many Russians, it is a religious awakening. "The majority of Russian men have to be circumcized and the brides go to the mikvah. They learn a lot about wedding rituals.

"It is a tremendous experience and a joyful event for the Canadian community as well. For years it rallied to get people out of the Soviet Union, and now they are here and getting introduced to their roots and to Jewish tradition."

Rabbi Zaltzman said the wedding is also a fundraiser for the Jewish Russian Community Centre, which serves the more than 25,000 Russian Jews in the Toronto area.

The centre runs daily and holiday synagogue serices, the Mindel Gelfand Daycare for children ages 2½ to 5 years, a Sunday and evening Hebrew school, adult educational programs and a Russian and English newspaper. As well, a youth program in high schools gives students a chance to have lunch and speak with a rabbi.

"We cover every age group and serve the community in any way we can ... There are four Russian-speaking rabbis to serve any need that arises" among our 6,000 families, the rabbi said.

Rhoda Singer, chair of the gala wedding supplement which will appear in The Canadian Jewish News prior to the wedding, said the supplement will tell the stories of many of the Russian Jews in the community.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman

"These people have interesting stories to tell," she said. "They are coming from a society devoid of spiritual attachment and they are now getting into the mainstream. The supplement should be a source of pride to the Russian community, as well as very interesting to [all] Canadians."

Honorary chairs of the gala wedding committee are Alex Eisen, Harvey Hecker, Herb Green and Mendel Green. Chairs are John Pollock, Moshe Ronen and Ralph Snow. Wedding co-ordinator is Arlene Weisbart. The community is invited to attend the wedding ceremony and the reception after the dinner. Tickets are required for the dinner only.

Bonds women's chair hopes to educate female investors

TORONTO — Community leader Dodi Weill knows that women today are managing their assets on their own.

That's why the newly appointed chair of the State of Israel Bonds Women's Division is making it her mission to inform them about all their investment options.

"We want to connect with many more women and educate them on Bond purchases, since more women are making decisions involving the management of their investments and retirement portfolios," Weill says.

The former executive member of United Jewish Appeal women's division wants to build Bond education and awareness. On the agenda are a number of cultural and community events and financial seminars, the first of which, entitled Bond Strategies for Income and Growth, was held recently at Midland Walwyn.

Weill says she doesn't want to see Bond purchases restricted to the High Holy Days.

"Bonds [can] be purchased by families for gifts year round, as they have the potential to substantially accumulate over the years to pay for family vacations in Israel, as well as bar and bat mitzvahs in Israel. Students who are interested in travel or education in Israel can also redeem their bonds to help pay for the cost."

State of Israel Bonds are interest-bearing loans to the Jewish State. They are expected to contribute nearly $10 billion (US) over the next decade towards massive infrastructure and high-technology development projects.

State of Israel Bonds can be purchased for a minimum of $250 (US). The instruments vary to include the Economic Development Issue Bond (8.4 per cent), Canadian Floating Rate Bond (7.25 per cent), Individual Variable Rate Issue (6.75 per cent), Zero Coupon Savings Bonds (8.25 per cent), Development Issue Savings Bond (4 per cent) and the newly created $100 gift certificate.

For more information, contact the State of Israel Bond office at 416-789-3351.

Multiculturalism recommendations made

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Representatives of cultural communities, business and government met recently to help create "a more harmonious, vibrant and fair society" through new recommendations on Canadian multiculturalism.

Some 100 participants at the forum on Unity in Diversity: A New Multicultural Policy for Canada? frankly discussed how business, education, public policy and community relations policies can be changed to better serve our multicultural society.

The recommendations were later presented to the federal minister of multiculturalism, Sheila Finestone.

Recommendations included:

- intervention and education programs for children between 12 and 15;
- police education on the meaning of state authority in local cultural communities;
- standardized pay equity policies and legislation in all levels of government;
- taking advantage of business expertise in immigrant communities in the realm of international trade;
- speeding up the evaluation and acceptance of foreign education credentials;
- more funding for adult education programs, especially language training;
- a call for politicians to respond to racism by making it clear the constitution and Charter of Rights and Freedoms forbid discrimination.

The public affairs forum was co-presented by the St. Lawrence Centre Forum and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, with the cooperation of the University of Toronto.

Shaar Shalom students 'go back' to ghetto

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Shaar Shalom religious school student Brandon Lewis recently learned what it was like for Jews living in the Warsaw ghetto during World War II.

"Life in the ghetto is difficult," the 12-year-old wrote in a pretend exercise. "We only eat once a day and then it's only a slice of bread."

The understanding came from a mini-course on heroes of the Warsaw ghetto taught by Grade 7 teacher Rabbi David Kalir.

Kalir used film footage of the ghetto and a documentary film on ghetto uprising leader Mordecai Anielewicz during the three-week course.

Kalir told The CJN the students debated on whether or not the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising was justified given the loss of life, and wrote letters, created diaries or worked on a ghetto newspaper to help capture living conditions.

'Horror of corpses lying on the ground'

The following excerpt from a diary dated Jan. 15, 1940 was written by 12-year-old Ian Barnett. "All I see is the horror of corpses lying on the ground ... and people begging for a measly piece of stale bread ... I have to wear this wretched star. I feel like an animal."

Barnett told The CJN he tried to put himself in the shoes of those who lived in the ghetto. "I thought of how it would feel to be trapped and live like that. I thought it would be pretty depressing."

The course was one of 11 mini-courses on Jewish heroes for religious school students in grades 3 through 7. The courses, part of a recent Beat the Winter Blahs program, were designed to give the children an opportunity "to participate in an arts-based activity," education director Karen Goodis told The CJN. "I thought that it was a good way of incorporating my goal of a creative experience with Jewish learning."

Students in grades 6 and 7 had a choice of studying Holocaust heros Anielewicz, Anne Frank, or Hannah Szenes, a young Hungarian woman who was caught and killed by the Nazis for spying.

Those who studied Frank created model-size replicas of the house she hid in with her family to escape the Nazis. The other group did a reading of a play based on Szenes' life.

Grade 5 students focused on Israeli heroes, like those at Masada, as well as Theodor Herzl and Golda Meir.

The grade 3 and 4 students did arts and crafts projects on biblical heroes Rebecca, Joseph, Jacob, Abraham, Moses.

The children had a great time with the Beat-the-Blahs projects, Goodis said. "It's the process of creating and learning that's important. The fact that the kids had a nice end result was a bonus."

Catholic students hold Holocaust play

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Acting the parts of Jewish teenagers whose lives were brutally cut short in the Holocaust has had a profound effect on students of a Catholic high school, according to their drama teacher, Maggie Weller.

Members of the Jewish community who saw the play were also very moved by the production.

Children Of The Holocaust, by American author Robert Mauro, was the St. Mary's Catholic High School entry in the recent Hamilton-Wentworth regional Sears High School Drama Festival. The play was chosen by the students.

The best actor award went to Dennis Rego (as Michael), and an award of merit for directing went to Hussein Daya. Both are OAC students.

But Weller later quoted the students as saying, "We've touched so many people, that winning was not important."

The play's setting, Weller said, is "somewhere in another dimension," where four teenagers discuss their hopes, their shattered dreams, their fear that no one will remember them. Michael, who wanted to be a scientist, is very, very bitter; Anne, ever optimistic, wanted to be a writer and hopes that someone will find her diary; Rachel will never have the children she longed for; and David is unable to cope with the pain of his experiences but is reminded by the others that he wanted to be a doctor.

Interviewed prior to the festival, the students proved sensitive and articulate. All said that the play had been an eye opener.

Soft-spoken Daya said he knew the moment he read it, that "this was the play I wanted to do.

"To realize what happened," he said, "the effect it had on the Jewish people, what they suffered ... and then, [the play's concluding words] 'We must always remember.' "

Although the students had learned about the Holocaust in history class and had seen movies and documentaries, playing these parts brought home "the terrible tragedy," Rego said.

The Holocaust doesn't become real until you understand what happened to people, remarked Jenna Pollard, Grade 12, who played "the really devastating" part of Rachel. "I was just overwhelmed," she said.

For Grade 11 student, James Major, who had previously taken part only in what he termed "happy plays," playing David was an intensely emotional experience and he felt honored, he said, to be part of a play "that was going to say something to somebody."

"What the play really boils down to," observed Rego, "is that it's not us performing but four people telling a story that needs to be told. The more people who can hear that story, the better."

Video tapes of the play will be made available to the local Holocaust Education Committee and Jewish schools.

Prisoner repaid debt by crafting Megillah box

By DR. FRED WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was 1930 and he was a prisoner in Dorchester Penitentiary in New Brunswick.

Purim was coming, bringing with it memories of his childhood growing up in Saint John and going to shul on Wellington Row. He particularly remembered Purim and the reading of the Megillah, with its romantic story of Queen Esther and how she saved the Jewish people, though in general, he had little use for the religious rituals of his family.

Our prisoner was a skilful woodworker who fashioned string instruments for the folk musicians of New Brunswick, and his craftsmanship was renowned throughout the Maritimes.

As a prisoner, he was befriended by and became quite close to Abraham Leon Kaplansky, a volunteer chaplain at the Dorchester, N.B. Penitentiary, as well as at the Saint Vincent de Paul Penitentiary in Montreal.

The prisoner wanted to repay Kaplansky for his kindness and accordingly drew up plans for making a box to hold the Purim Megillah used in the Wellington Row synagogue. Kaplansky had brought the Megillah with him from White Russia just before the turn of the century and given it to the synagogue, but the scroll had no storage case.

Kaplansky gave the prisoner the dimensions of the Megillah — the roller was 19 inches high, the parchment itself 12 inches. The box the prisoner fashioned was of contrasting woods with an inlaid Star of David in the centre.

Kaplansky arranged for the unique case to be presented to the synagogue on Wellington Row.

The scroll he donated was written in Ashkenazi script. The tools and materials that had been used in writing the scroll were parchment, a quill, ink, a ruler and a guide book — the text from a book or another scroll.

There are many rules about the manufacture of the parchment; today the hide of a kosher animal is softened by soaking it first in clear water and then in lime water.

In ancient Talmudic times, reeds were used as pens; today the quill of a turkey feather is employed because of its sturdiness. The sofer cuts the point of the feather to give it a flat surface and then slits it lengthwise, a technique desirable for forming the square letters.

The black ink is made by boiling a complex mixture of various materials. To ensure that the letters will be straight and the lines equally spaced, 43 thin lines are drawn across the width of the parchment with a stylus and a ruler. A three-inch margin is left at the top, a four-inch margin at the bottom and a two-inch margin between the columns.

The case made for the megillah by the Jewish prisoner. [From the collection of Dr. Fred Weinberg.]

The formation of specific letters were often traditions handed down from father to son.

After the copying of the scroll has been completed, the sheets of parchment are sewn together with a special thread made of tendon tissue from the foot muscles of a kosher animal.

One can imagine the great satisfaction of our Jewish prisoner in Saint John, N.B., in having connected once more with his childhood and his family traditions, and at the same time, expressing his gratitude to Abraham Kaplansky who had shown him so much consideration.

Scribe immerses himself in a mikvah

Although Hebrew is read from right to left, each individual letter in the scroll is written from left to right. Seven of the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet have special designs, called tagin, in the upper left hand corner of the letter. The tagin are shaped somewhat like the letter zayin and are placed above the letter, almost touching it.

In Kaplansky's scroll, the sofer has formed the letter chet — the eighth letter of the alphabet — by using two letters zayin side by side. This is in the non-chassidic tradition (whereas in Poland, in forming the letter chet, the chassidic soferim would use a straight letter vav on the right and the letter zayin on the left).

FUN FOR CHILDREN

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

Welcome again to CJNews for Kids. Thank you for sending your comics and puzzles. Purim is a holiday that makes us happy. We are glad for Esther and what happened in Shushan. We celebrate that Jewish people overcame the threat from the evil Haman. Have fun with your friends and family this Purim since this is the happiest holiday of the year. The next children's column will come out at Pesach.

WRITE THE CORRECT WORD ALONGSIDE THE JUMBLED ONE

When Purim is here we:

TEA: _____
KRIND: _____
GNIS: _____
DECAN: _____
SUPSERO: _____
MAN TOP SKUS: _____
FASET: _____
KONI SEAME _____
PAYL: _____

ANSWERS (in order)
EAT, DRINK, SING, DANCE, DRESS UP, PUT ON MASKS, FEAST, MAKE NOISE, PLAY, GO BANANAS

Purim Treats

The foods that we eat during Purim remind us of the banquest Esther made for the king. Some Jewish people eat kreplach or boiled dumplings, verenikes (larger than kreplach), potatoes, and kasha. What you eat has a lot to do with what country your family comes from.The word "hamantaschen" is a mixture of poppy seed, pockets, and Haman's hat. Put your cookies on your plates with the rest of your shalach manot but be sure to save some for yourself.

Hamantaschen
2 cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 cup sugar
1/4 lb. margarine
2 eggs — beat a little
1 tsp. vanilla

Mix first three ingredients. Add margarine, then eggs and vanilla. Mix until it makes a ball. Add more flour if you need to. Roll out thin on a floured board. Cut circles using a cutter or the top of a glass. You can fill with jelly, pastry filling or chocolate chips. Pinch up three sides to make a triangle. Bake at 350 for 25-30 minutes. Enjoy!

We give to our friends and to the poor at Purim. To help a family in need, call Jewish Family and Child Service at (416) 638-7800.

Arts & Crafts

1/ You need your own graggers or noise maker to make the loudest sound when your hear Haman's name. Use a plastic container, or juice can, and fill it part way with dry beans, rice, stones or screws. Tape it to keep the lid on well. Cover it with paper, stickers, paint, or other found scraps.

2/ What will you do with your mishloah manot? Take a paper plate or bag and decorate it with ribbons, comics, and draw your favorite Purim character. Now you just have to decide who to give it to.

3/ Who are you dressing up as for Purim? Look around, ask for some help and you can put together your own costume. Crowns and hats are fun to make with tin foil, glue, cardboard and lots of imagination. it's fun to put on your own play and act it out for your family.

HAVE FUN!

PURIM TRIVIA:

Esther: The heroine of the Purim story. Cousin of Mordechai, she was originally known as Hadassah. Chosen as queen, she risked her life to plead with the king for her people's safety.
Jair: Ben Jair, actually is another name by which Mordechai is known. Ben Jair means "son of light" for it is said, Mordechai illuminated the eyes of Israel.
Lots: The meaning of the word "Purim." The name commemorates the fact that Haman and his fellow-plotters chose a day — the thirteenth of Adar — to destroy all the Jews.
Mishloah Manot: Often called Shaloah Manot, it means "the sending of gifts." The custom involves sending portions to one another.
Parades: They are part of Purim festivities. The most famous of all is the Adloyada carnival in Tel Aviv, complete with floats, streamers, costumes and balloons.
Shushan: The capital of Ahasuerus' kingdom. Mordechai and Esther lived there and the drama of Purim took place.

UJA March sets the theme

TORONTO — From Metulla to Eilat is the theme of this year's UJA Community March for Israel on May 28, referring to Israel's northern and southernmost cities.

March co-chair Jeff Cohen says the theme was chosen because "the March for Israel has always been for kids in Toronto and kids in Israel. We want people to know we're helping them throughout the length and breadth of the country."

Funds raised will be used for programs in Israel to help children and teenagers who have recently made aliyah.

The march will follow last year's route starting at the Promenade at Bathurst and Clark, and finishing at the Bathurst Jewish Centre with a community festival, which will include live entertainment and a kosher barbecue.

"The festivities will be more of a celebration this year," promises co-chair Maura Cooperberg. "There wasn't enough last year to keep people at the festival for a long time. So, we're adding more attractions."

Additional buses to transport tired marchers will be provided and geographical markers will be placed along the route to indicate cities between Metulla and Eilat.

Last year's march attracted close to 7,000 participants. It was preceded by a recruitment drive in Jewish day schools. Cooperberg hopes to expand pre-march information sessions to public schools with large Jewish populations.

Patients' memories used to treat illness at Baycrest

TORONTO — A unique support group at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care is using memories to help the ill.

Five chronic care patients reminisce together for one hour a week in the belief that looking back is an excellent tool for adapting to their changed lifestyles.

"They're coming to terms with living here and they're coming to terms with their own mortality," said social worker and session leader Jan Boyd. "Through reminiscence they can look at themselves and close certain chapters in their life."

Participants, said social work director Etta Ginsberg McEwan, find the session helpful in coping with their medical difficulties and with institutional living.

Group conversations often turn to persecution suffered in the "old country" and gratitude to Canada for opening its doors. "They felt this country embraced them and gave them an opportunity to make a living," Boyd said. "I look at their resiliency and wonder where their strength comes from."

Participants share their memories of religious observances and struggling for financial survival. According to Boyd, group members are "very interested in what other people have to say. They are very proud of themselves and their accomplishments."

The chronic care reminiscence group is part of an extensive Baycrest support network.

Israel agrees to concessions

Israeli troops from Arab population centres in the West Bank, in exchange for a Palestinian crackdown on armed groups operating in the self-rule zones.

Peres said Israel also agreed to a number of confidence-building gestures, including the transfer of five more areas of responsibility to the Palestinians in the West Bank.

Israel also agreed to a further easing of the closure of the territories, a move that will allow several thousand more Palestinian workers to enter Israel from Gaza and the West Bank, bringing the daily total to about 21,000 people.

But there was no indication of when Palestinian elections would be held and Peres stressed that Israeli troops in the West Bank would not be redeployed before July 1.

Although Peres and Arafat exchanged smiles and jokes during the conference, the Palestinians adopted a more moderate tone in describing Thursday's announcement.

Arafat said he would "wait and see" before declaring the deadlock in their talks broken.

On Saturday, Arafat and other Palestinian leaders denied there had been any breakthrough with Israel, saying that fundamental differences remained.

After his talks with Arafat, Christopher said he received assurances that the Palestinian Authority (PA) would take new measures to prevent terror.

"Gaza cannot be a safe haven" for terrorists, Christopher said. "There are important steps that can be taken."

Arafat maintained that his forces had prevented 10 terrorist attacks in recent months, and that the suspects are in jail.

The PLO leader pledged cooperation in the battle against terror, but cautioned that he had no "magic stick" to prevent further attacks.

Christopher outlined new American aid to the PA, including 200 surplus trucks and the dispatch of teams from the U.S. Defence and Agriculture departments for advice on medical, humanitarian and agricultural needs.

In addition to his meetings last week with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Peres, Christopher met with President Ezer Weizman and Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

Christopher said there was "no turning back" in the peace process, and pledged American support to the negotiating efforts with Syria.

Rabin stressed Israel's commitment to the talks with Damascus. "I would like to make it clear: we are capable of achieving peace with Syria," he said.

Christopher returned to Israel on Monday, after holding talks with President Hafez al-Assad. Syrian media indicated that Christopher should not expect Assad to make any concessions to Israel.

The Syrian daily A-Thawra condemned what it called the United States' "absolute support of Israel" and said the Americans had yet to prove that they are fair and impartial mediators.

New IRB ruling disturbing

"The claimant has no fear of persecution in Israel, well-founded or otherwise ... [she] is not a person who 'truly requires' or 'genuinely needs' protection. That protection is available to her in Israel."

The Federal Court of Canada has agreed to hear an appeal of the ruling, perhaps as soon as this summer.

Said to be the first of its kind in Canada, the decision has angered several lawyers, who see in it a perverse twist to Canada's wartime "none is too many" policy of restricted Jewish immigration. They hear rumblings of similar IRB rulings in the future.

The ruling is "very disappointing" and "a clear error in law," Mark Fromkin, Grygorian's lawyer, told The CJN.

Toronto immigration lawyer Guidy Mamann, whose office is handling Grygorian's appeal, said the decision raises the question "of whether or not Jews are eligible to make a refugee claim in Canada at all. They have said that because you're Jewish, you're an Israeli citizen.

"They may have found a new way to exclude a whole group of claimants."

Mamann said Avery stands out for his apparent belief that Jewish claimants should live in Israel instead of Canada.

Mamann said he represents a Lithuanian Jewish woman whose refugee claim Avery questioned by wondering why she has not considered Israel as a new home.

Avery also raised the issue in the claim of a Jewish couple from Moldova, Mamann said.

Similar concerns about Avery were raised by Toronto lawyer Harvey Savage, who represents an elderly Jewish woman from Lvov, in western Ukraine, where anti-Semitism is reported to be prevalent.

"He asked me why she doesn't apply to Israel," Savage told The CJN. "That just threw me."

Savage called the Grygorian ruling "dangerous" because it "tries to equate potential nationality with actual nationality. It could affect other decisions."

Savage said the ruling also points to the "dangers" of Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi's plan to reduce IRB refugee claim panels from two members to one. Under current rules, if the two members are split, the claimant is successful.

Susan Davis, national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), agrees the ruling could embolden other IRB members to arrive at similar conclusions.

"It's quite dangerous to say, in effect, that Canada is open to anyone but Jews," Davis said.

She noted that China's constitution extends citizenship to all ethnic Chinese no matter where they live, "but that doesn't mean we tell Chinese claimants to go home."

Avery, a lawyer, was appointed to the IRB in 1993.

Displaced Palestinians on agenda

Arabs want '48 and '67 wars included

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

AMMAN — Representatives from Israel, Egypt, Jordan and the PLO convened here last Tuesday for their first meeting to discuss the thorny issue of the possible return to the West Bank and Gaza Strip of Palestinians displaced by the 1967 Six Day War.

Differences in Israeli and Arab expectations from the meeting were evident in how each side described the session.

The Israeli team, led by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, called the session an "informal consultation meeting," while the Arab leaders referred to it as a formal attempt to solve the problem of displaced persons.

Israel emphasized caution and a detailed look at the displaced persons issue, while the Arab front urged that Jerusalem immediately allow Palestinians to return to the territories.

"We were one against three," said Peres. "There was an argument, but it didn't turn into a brawl."

The Palestinians, along with Egypt and Jordan, prepared a position paper proposing a timetable for the return of displaced Palestinians from both the 1948 and 1967 wars, saying there was no dispute over the question of their right to return.

Provisions for the return of displaced Palestinians were included in both the 1978 Camp David Accords and in the Declaration of Principles signed by Israel and the Palestinians in Washington in September 1993.

Palestinian chief negotiator Nabil Sha'ath called on Israel to make a goodwill gesture by allowing the immediate return to the territories of some 1,000 Palestinians, but Peres called for caution and "a realistic solution."

"We must take care not to solve one problem by complicating others," he said in his opening statement.

He stressed that the Palestinian Authority (PA) must take into account its ability to absorb a large number of Palestinians.

He called on the Palestinian leadership to seek international financial assistance in building the infrastructure needed to integrate returning Palestinians.

The actual number of Palestinians displaced by the Six-Day War has been a source of dispute.

The Palestinians have estimated the number of those displaced, as well as their offspring, at about 800,000.

Israel, which does not include descendants in its count, puts the figure closer to 200,000.

Israel has pressed for a gradual return, and is believed to have offered compensation to those Palestinians who choose not to go back.

For hours, the four delegations thrashed out drafts of a communique. In the end, everyone seemed satisfied with the joint statement.

They agreed to establish a permanent committee, composed of two panels. One would consist of Sha'ath and the foreign ministers of Egypt, Israel and Jordan, and would meet every two or three months.

The other would be composed of experts, and will convene every three weeks.

Not on the meeting's formal agenda was the fate of Palestinian refugees from the 1948 War of Independence.

United Nations estimates put the total number of Palestinian refugees and their descendants at 2.7 million.

That issue is slated to be discussed in direct negotiations in 1996.

In the meantime, Peres ruled out allowing Palestinians to begin returning to their one-time homes.

"Every concession must be carefully studied to ensure that there is no precedent," he said. "I am not Uncle Sam. I didn't come to hand out sweets."

* * *

Also last week, Israeli Justice Minister David Liba'i said the question of Palestinian right of return is not on the government's agenda.

Liba'i was responding to a private member's bill by Likud MK Uzi Landau which would prevent the government from holding talks on the refugee and displaced Palestinians.

His bill was defeated 47-36.

Landau said Judea and Samaria would turn into "bases of terrorism" if Palestinians returned there. "It's a policy of national suicide."

Palestinian population increases

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian population in Gaza, Judea, Samaria and Jerusalem was 1.993 million at the end of 1993, representing a 3.7 per cent increase over the previous year, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported last Tuesday.

The bureau's figures disagree with a survey ordered by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin at the end of last year, which estimated the Palestinian population at 2.4 million.

According to Palestinian estimates, the Palestinian population reached 2.019 million at the end of 1992, or 5.5 per cent more than Israeli figures.

Palestinians estimated the population of Judea and Samaria, including east Jerusalem, at 1.272 million, and that of Gaza at 747,000.

Separation plan divides IDF, police

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force (IDF) and the police are reportedly at odds over the best way to separate Israelis from Palestinians.

Before meeting with senior IDF officers last week, Police Minister Moshe Shahal told reporters there were few differences over the separation plan.

But IDF representatives on the committee criticized Shahal's plan as too ambitious, expensive and difficult to implement.

Shahal said his plan is expected to cost up to a half-million shekels, which he said was far lower than originally expected because soldiers, not police officers, would conduct the patrols to keep Palestinians from Judea and Samaria from illegally entering Israel.

IDF representatives, including Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, proposed a leaner and more focused plan, at a lower cost.

The police plan calls for army units, aided by attack dogs and helicopters, to patrol a corridor several kilometers east of the Green Line to prevent Palestinians from entering Israel.

Between eight and 10 checkpoints, also east of the Green Line, are to be built, and Palestinians will only be allowed to cross through them. Severe penalties will be imposed on Palestinians who try to cross without permits.

Shahal said he had yet to hear from the Finance Ministry, which must approve the funding.

The army contends that checkpoints, patrols, and electronic devices are wasteful and will not necessarily prevent infiltrations.

It proposes local separation areas, like the current Erez checkpoint, as well as patrols and electronic methods in places where Arab villages and towns abut Israel.

Terrorism-related deaths increase

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Terror claimed the lives of 123 Israelis during the 18 months since the Oslo accords were signed, an 85 per cent increase over the 18-month period before the accords, according to Peace Watch.

The organization monitors the implementation of the Oslo agreements.

Only 67 Israelis were killed between March 1992 and Sept. 8, 1993, the eve of the signing of mutual recognition between Israel and the PLO.

The increase came principally within the Green Line, where fatalities more than tripled. From March 1992 to Sept. 8, 1993, 23 Israelis were killed in Israel proper, while from Sept. 9, 1993 through March 8, the figure jumped to 81.

The Week in Israel

March 6:

• At the special intelligence briefing of cabinet, military officers renewed warnings about Iran's nuclear military potential. They assert that Iran may possibly have an operational nuclear capability within three to five years.

March 7:

• Israel's representative at the UN and Lebanon's ambassador met with the president pro tem of the Security Council to discuss the military situation in Lebanon. The meeting was arranged with the help of the government of Oman.

March 8:

• At a special news conference Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert and Tourism Minister Uzi Baram announced that the celebrations marking Jerusalem 3000 will commence in the fall and continue for a period of 15 months.

• A military delegation from Russia headed by the assistant secretary of defence arrived in Damascus to discuss armament sales with Mustafa Tlas, the Syrian minister of defence. Army sources report they are watching this development very closely.

March 9:

• The government awaits the visit of U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher from his visit in Syria. He is expected to bring agreement for the resumption of talks between the Israeli and Syrian chiefs of staff.

• Haaretz reported a majority of Americans support the stationing of American observers in the Golan Heights as part of an agreement between Israel and Syria according to a poll conducted by the State Department. However support dropped significantly when the term observers was changed to soldiers.

March 10:

• The first commercial airline flight from Jordan to a destination in Europe flies over Israeli skies.

• Former MK and IDF General (Res.) Mati Peled died at his home in Motza Ilit. Peled entered political life on the far left side of the spectrum in the 1970s after completing a doctorate in Arabic language and literature. He was 72.

• A total of 16 people were killed this week in highway accidents. Eight of the dead were pedestrians. Since the start of January, 118 people have been killed on Israel's roads.

Israel remains committed to peace process: Rabin

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel will continue with the peace process as long as his party has a majority in the Knesset, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told a convention of Reform rabbis last week.

"I feel there is a window of opportunity, and I don't know how long it will remain open," Rabin said.

"What is most important is not what the people want," Rabin told the opening session of the 106th annual convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, which includes Reform rabbis in Canada. "What is important is what is needed for the people.

"I will not define a [final] map," Rabin said. "I am not guided by a map, I am guided by principles."

Rabin said he is also guided by a desire not to rule over another entity, "and the Palestinians are a different entity."

But at the same time, Jerusalem will remain united under Israeli rule, the Jordan River and valley will remain the eastern security border, and Israel "will not automatically return to the pre-1967 lines."

Rabin said there are 4.4 million Jews and 3 million Palestinians between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. This, he said, includes as many as 900,000 Palestinians in Gaza, 1.2 million in Judea and Samaria, about 170,000 in Jerusalem, and 900,000 "Israeli Arabs, who consider themselves Palestinians.

"One small party understands the demographic situation and advocates transfer [forced relocation of Palestinians]," Rabin said. "The others do not say it, but would transfer apartheid to Israel. If there is something that is Jewish, it is that racism and Judaism are in the sharpest contrast."

There are two main threats to the peace process, he said: Islamic fundamentalist terror and the fear among some Arab elements that "Israel is going to conquer the Arab world economically."

During the 106th annual convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, Reform Jews conducted services at the southern wall of the Temple Mount. [RNS photo]

British PM visits Israel

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Forty-seven years after the British left Israel, the Union Jack again flew over Jerusalem last Sunday as British Prime Minister John Major began a two-day visit.

Following a dinner in Major's honor at the King David Hotel, both he and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin discussed terrorism.

"We are constantly tested. The scourge of terrorism has afflicted both our countries," Major said. "There can be no place for violence in a democratic state."

Major dismissed comparisons between the PLO and Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army. He said Yasser Arafat has denounced terrorism while Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams has not.

Rabin stressed that "the only obstacle to our common goal [of peace] is terrorism."

Major, only the second British prime minister to visit Israel after Margaret Thatcher, took a strong stand against Iraq's Saddam Hussein, urging for the continuation of sanctions imposed in the wake of the Gulf War.

"The international community must not be gulled by Saddam's tactics of evasion and deception. I can assure you that the United Kingdom will not be deceived."

Major signed an agreement doubling the science and technology research fund established by Britain and Israel last year.

Israel is Britain's third-largest market in the Middle East, he said. "Trade and investment go hand in hand, and investment in Israel is a prudent investment for the future."

He said he planned to increase financial aid to the Palestinian Authority (PA). Major was scheduled to meet PLO leader Yasser Arafat in Gaza later this week. So far, Britain has pledged $125 million to the PA over three years.

Palestinian officials were buoyed by Major's promises of aid. "We hope Major's visit will take this peace process one step forward," said Palestinian Planning Minister Nabil Sha'ath.

Anti-Semitic acts up: ADL

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — More acts of anti-Semitism were recorded by the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL) in 1994 than in any of the 16 years the organization has conducted its annual audit.

The ADL tallied 2,066 incidents last year, an increase of more than 10 per cent from 1993. Campus incidents rose for the seventh straight year in 1994, 17 per cent higher than the 1993 figures, with 143 incidents at 79 universities and colleges.

The 1994 incidents included in the ADL audit range from the murder of Aaron Halberstam, a Lubavitch student who was shot on the Brooklyn Bridge by Rashid Baz on March 1, 1994, to a swastika scratched in a men's bathroom stall at Colby College in September.

In two other non-fatal but serious incidents, a California yeshivah student was attacked by a skinhead wielding a 3-foot pipe and a screwdriver who screamed, "I hate Jews! I'll kill you!" and in Memphis, two 13-year-old Jewish boys were attacked by two older teens who beat them with a sword while yelling anti-Semitic epithets. One of the young victims was hospitalized with a punctured kidney and broken ribs.

There were more acts of vandalism and arson against Jewish institutions and property owned by Jews — 869 incidents — than in recent years.

At the same time, there were 141 arrests for anti-Semitic crimes last year, more than twice the 60 arrests documented in 1993.

ADL attributed the increase in arrests to a number of factors, including the rise in violent incidents "that often produce evidence leading to the arrests of the suspected perpetrators and the growing impact of state and federal hate-crime legislation."

Forty-seven states and the District of Columbia now have hate-crime statutes.

Search for Grozny Jews planned

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Sally Becker, dubbed the "Angel of Mostar" for her humanitarian work in the besieged Bosnian city, will return to the Chechen capital of Grozny later this month to locate dozens of missing Jews there.

The 34-year-old artist, who returned to Britain last week after a 10-day preliminary visit to the breakaway Chechen republic, will be making a return mission as a voluntary emissary of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

"The agency knows there are between 40 and 100 people missing" from among the Jews who reportedly fled the war-torn city of Grozny, Becker said. "When I go back, I intend to conduct a house-to-house search for them."

In December and January, with Russian troops pounding Grozny, the agency helped about 50 Jewish refugees immigrate to Israel. At the time, agency officials had estimated that some 40 Jewish families, comprising about 150 people, remained in the capital.

Becker said she met Berta-Nina Kostukova, a 57-year-old Jewish refugee from Grozny whose son and daughter-in-law are still in the Chechen capital.

"She had to move from one shelter to another after her flat was destroyed in the bombing. At one point she was very close to a tank that was destroyed," Becker said.

"She told me the situation now is far worse than in the World War II. There are hardly any shelters left now and there are no air-raid warnings when the Russians attack," she said.

"Most of the Jews are old enough to remember going through the same traumas during the war. They've lost all their possessions, but now they want to go to Israel, despite the fact that the thought of starting all over frightens them."

Becker said she has the agency's blessing to help find the stranded Jews.

When the agency's local representative tried to reach Grozny, he was turned back by Russian troops, she said.

Through the agency, Becker has managed to get the names and addresses of 30 people she would try to contact upon her return.

Becker is also determined to help the orphans — Jews and non-Jews alike — now roaming the streets of Grozny. "I am the only person who is taking up their cause," she said.

Jewish Agency emissary killed in Ukraine squabble

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — A Jewish Agency emissary in Ukraine was killed last weekend after he allegedly squabbled with a neighbor about the playing of loud music.

Shimon Feingold, a 49-year-old married father of two, died in Kiev last Saturday.

His death did not occur as a result of anti-Semitic motives, said Yoseph Tropiansky, head of Jewish Agency operations in Ukraine.

According to Agency reports, Feingold was in his fifth-floor apartment Saturday afternoon, when he heard loud music and noise from an upstairs floor. Shortly after he went upstairs to ask the neighbors to turn down the music, Feingold's wife, Chava, heard yells followed by a loud bang.

She rushed out to find her husband lying on the steps bleeding from the head. Attempts to revive Feingold failed, and he died soon after.

Feingold was allegedly pushed down the stairs.

After the incident, the neighbors fled the apartment, but Kiev police tracked them down.

Feingold's autopsy showed he had received a powerful blow to the jaw prior to his fall.

In Jerusalem, Avraham Burg, acting chair of the Jewish Agency, expressed shock and sorrow over the death and expressed his condolences to the family.

He called a special meeting of Jewish Agency officials Sunday to discuss the incident and its ramifications.

Feingold arrived in Kiev last year for a two-year stint representing the Youth Department of the Agency. He was organizing summer camps and youth clubs.

His body was flown to Israel. The funeral took place at Kibbutz Hazerim, near Beersheva, where the family had lived.

KOSHER LIFESTYLE

Chicken lovers still flocking to their favourite "Nest"

Think "chicken", think "fresh", "hot" , "delicious", and "kosher", and chances are you're already on your way to The Chicken Nest at Bathurst and Lawrence. (Take the shortest route: as the "chicken" flies).

Since opening a year and a half ago, the "Nest", as it's affectionately known, has been a haven for people who love their chicken in many different ways: barbecued (much healthier than deep fried or pan fried), in sandwiches, in salads ... Throw in some delicious ribs cooked the old-fashioned way, freshly-baked French baguettes, a fabulous variety of salads and mouthwatering desserts, and you have a pretty fair recipe for fowl success.

Owners Shalom and Linda Magazzinich have also seen their catering business grow, as many clients seem to enjoy having the Nest fly to their nest. For private parties, lunches, and special occasions, the food is always fresh and delicious, and the prices reasonable.

The moral is clear: don't walk, don't run, wing it to The Chicken Nest.

L'Echaim caters to special needs

For the elderly, the infirm, and anyone confined to or leaving a hospital or convalescent home, delicious affordable kosher meals are just a phone call away.

L'Echaim Caterers' many years of expertise in gourmet kosher catering has earned it a slew of institutional catering contracts, including several local area hospitals. But the bulk of its business is still its private clientele, who enjoy the same quality, variety, and strict adherence to kashruth in everything from daily meals to wedding and bar mitzvah dinners.

Catering to special dietary needs. L'Echaim will tailor your menu to suit any special dietary needs, from salt-free to puréed and everything in between. And they'll do it without sacrificing variety: you'll always have a multitude of delicious options, whisked to your door within hours of placing your order.

President Aliette Ponte explains the popularity of this service: "It enables parents or other relatives living in a non-kosher environment to continue to enjoy kosher meals and carry on a part of their lifestyle that they might otherwise have to abandon."

The freedom from worry about what's for lunch and dinner, coupled with the huge time and energy saving of having complete meals ready to heat and serve, is another compelling advantage for parents and children alike. Indeed, many of L'Echaim's customers have been overheard making the most uncharacteristic of Jewish admissions: "I couldn't have made it better myself!"

New at B'nai Torah

Tri Elm Catering is happy to announce that it has recently become the exclusive caterer at Congregation B'nai Torah on Patricia Avenue in North York.

Owner Joe Elmaleh says that B'nai Torah's elegant banquet hall complete with new chairs, broadloom and with a peach backdrop is a classic room to hold every type of simcha up to 300 people.

Parties larger than 300 and up to 1000 people can still be catered by Tri Elm, at the Hollywood Princess located at Highway 7 and Keele in Concord. "With our catering services offered at B'nai Torah as well as private homes, we are able to accommodate parties of every size, from the most intimate to large, lavish functions," says Elmaleh.

Elmaleh says that Tri Elm specializes in customized menus and now especially, with the emphasis on low fat, lean cooking, are light and low in cholesterol.

Elmaleh aims to make Tri Elm a one-stop party centre and with that in mind he offers free party planning services ranging from arranging for invitations, video, photography, music and flowers to decorations and color schemes.

He knows how important it is for people to work within a budget and he assures customers that he can arrange elegant parties while keeping within that budget. "I am open to all types of dinners from buffets right up to multi-course sit-down meals. I make sure that everyone is happy with their choice. I try to make every affair as stress-free as possible."

Customized menus at Malmar

To all those people who miss the delectable foods of Tastefully Yours — as of April Malmar will be opening new kitchens with a wholesale outlet. Please watch for further information. Malmar will be ready to accommodate your Passover orders, offering the same imaginative cuisine and excellent service you've come to expect from them.

The Schaffers specialize in in-house and corporate catering, as well as simchas and entertaining in your home.

They are glad to advise clients on the variety of different foods available. Each menu is customized to reflect the taste of the client, and uses only the best and freshest of ingredients. Malmar can supply everything: staff, food, tableware, even rentals such as chairs, tables or if needed, a tent for outdoor functions.

"You will be proud to serve your guests our food because of its quality, freshness and presentation," Deanna Schaffer promises.

For those with special health needs, such as low-fat, low salt, dietetic or vegetarian diets, Malmar will make foods to your special order.

Some people use this service to stock the freezers of their elderly parents or children away at university, who find it difficult to prepare nutritious healthy and appetizing meals for themselves, Deanna Schaffer explains.

Eat Cake?

It used to be that Canadians would sneak Entenmann's luscious cakes, cookies, loafs, pies, and doughnuts into the country, stash them in their freezers, and dole them out to special friends. If they didn't keep them all for themselves.

Is it really less than five years since these great baked goods have been sold on this side of the border?

Now, in keeping with their commitment to pleasing their customers, they are introducing for the first time in Canada (snowbirds will remember seeing them "down south" for some years) fat-free items.

Golden and marble pound loafs, chocolate cupcakes, fruit-topped cake and crunch cake will be at your local store shortly. Officially labeled 97 per cent fat-free, they will combine the good taste Entenmann's is known for with the healthier ingredients people want.

These five items are just the beginning, says sales representative Mike Smith, who promises that more fat-free selections are coming.

Entenmann's will also be increasing their 50 per cent less fat selections, adding thick fudge golden cake, crumb delight cake, lemon danish twist and blueberry crunch loaf to their current product line of eight, which includes doughnuts, chocolate chip cookies and apple pie.

The regular line is not being neglected, Smith notes. In fact, it is being expanded as well. In the next few weeks, all-butter milk chocolate chip loaf, pineapple crumb loaf and fudge peanut butter cookies are just a few that we hope to see and will add a new and delicious touch to your table.

These new products will join your old favorites — banana cake, fruit strips, holiday cakes, Louisiana crunch cake and those great doughnut.

And does anyone not like English Toffee Cookies, sweet, chewy cookies full of tantalizing toffee chips?

All Entenmann's baked goods are dairy, under the supervision of O-U. They are available in major supermarket chains and many independent stores.

Entenmann's has a reputation for high quality, variety and freshness. for most satisfied customers, what counts is the great taste.

Sam Firestone features "the biggest serving spoons in kosher catering"

Celebrating its 30th year as the exclusive caterer at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Sam Firestone Caterers is still known for its excellent value, high quality and great food.

Sam's son Les, who continued the family tradition when he joined his father in the business some two years ago, says that personal service has always been a top priority. "We are there from the initial meeting until the end of the function to make sure that everything is running smoothly. We don't stop working until the last guest has gone home".

Eating habits have changed in the past several years, and Sam Firestone Caterers has adapted its menus to keep up with the trend toward lower fat, lighter foods. "We still prepare the traditional chicken and beef dinners but many people are asking for lighter fare and we have altered our menus accordingly. We now cook a variety of fresh fish and we've even prepared entire vegetarian dinners with pastas, vegetable cutlets, soups and salads.

"We specialize in customized menus so if someone comes in with an idea or a family's favorite dish we can have it prepared. Customers can taste samples of everything on their menu so there are no surprises. Jimmy Lyras, the executive chef, works closely with our customers to ensure they are getting exactly what they want. Kids are not forgotten, and they can choose from such popular fare as Italian, Mexican, Mediterranean, or Chinese food."
